*JUDGES OF THE VELUM AND JUDGES OF THE HIPPODROME
IN THESSALONIKE (11TH C.)*

Although there is an abundance of studies on the Byzantine Empire's second city, there is one aspect of the history of Thessalonike that needs further research, and that is the administration of justice. This paper endeavours to analyse one facet of this topic. It focuses on judicial officers acting in Thessalonike in the 11th century, and more specifically on those who, according to the sources, had previously served in the courts of Constantinople. The wealth of sigillary material and documents relating to the region that is preserved in the archives of the Athonite monasteries has enabled us to draw certain conclusions regarding the operation of the judicial system itself.

The official responsible for hearing cases in the district of Thessalonike at that time was the judge of the theme. Since, however, from the second fifth of the 11th century onward, the sources refer to a broader judicial and financial unit comprising the themes of Boleron, Strymon and *Thessalonike*¹, for the purposes of this paper we have studied seals and documents that mention judges of Thessalonike or judges of Boleron, Strymon and Thessalonike, as cited in the sources.

It is clear from the combined evidence of contemporary documents and seals that several of the judges, that we know to have served in Thessalonike in the 11th century, had previously been judges of the hippodrome or judges of the velum in Constantinople. According to the Ecloga Basilicorum, an extensively commented synopsis of the first ten books of the Basilica compiled most probably in Constantinople in 1142², the judges of the hippodrome and the judges of the velum were not classed among the “great” or superior judges, that is, the powerful magistrates (ἄρχοντες) who presided over the courts of the themes (krites, praitor) or of the imperial capital³, such as the

The evidence resulting from the publication of new documents and seals can now be added to the existing body of material relating to the judges of Boleron, Strymon and Thessalonike cited by these scholars: see e.g. Actes de Vatopédi, v. I, Des origines à 1329, ed. J. BOMPAIRE – J. LEFORT – V. KRAVARI – C. legal training and belonged to the class of professional judges and not that of *archons*⁸.

We have used the evidence of the sources to construct a chronological table of judges who had served in the courts of the imperial capital before being sent to Thessalonike or to the region of Boleron, Strymon and Thessalonike as judges of the theme. Wherever possible, we have endeavoured to formulate a specific position or hypothesis as regards the numerous problems of identity that we, like others before us, encountered.

The first judge of Thessalonike mentioned in the sources is the protospatharios and krites of the hippodrome Ioannes, who is named on a lead seal published by G. Schlumberger⁹. This seal probably predates the second fifth of the 11th century, the period in other words when the theme of Thessalonike begins to appear as a financial and judicial entity together with those of Boleron and Strymon. The judges cited below belong to the category of those whose sphere of responsibility lay within this administrative unit.

Thus, the Michael named on an 11th-century seal as *protospatharios, mystographos*¹⁰, *krites of the hippodrome, Boleron, Strymon and Thessalonike*¹¹, for example, may well (according to J. Nesbitt – N. Oikonomides) be the same person as the protospatharios of Chrysotriklinos and krites (of Boleron, Strymon, Thessalonike) Michael Serblias mentioned in a document circa 1029¹². While it is clear from the evidence of seals and the *Ecloga Basilicorum*¹³ that the Serbliai were a family of jurists in Constantinople, we do not know whether the above references concern one person or two.

A few years ago Ioannes Leontiades published a seal of Michael, patrikios, krites of the velum, of the hippodrome, Boleron, Strymon and Thessalonike, dated by the editor on the basis of typological characteristics to the middle of the 11th century¹⁴. This patrikios Michael, who is probably not the same person as the protospatharios (or protospatharioi) mentioned above, is yet another judge whose career took him from the courts of the imperial capital to those of the theme of Boleron, Strymon, Thessalonike.

Other judges appointed to this theme were the protospatharios, thesmographos and krites of the hippodrome Niketas, who is attested by a seal of the second quarter of the 11th century¹⁵, and the protospatharios, hypatos and krites of the hippodrome Basileios, attested by a seal that has been dated to the middle of that century¹⁶.

Another official who apparently served as judge of Boleron, Strymon and Thessalonike from 1047-1056 was the protospatharios and krites of the hippodrome Georgios Hexamilites, who is mentioned in documents preserved in the archives of the Monastery of Iviron¹⁷.

The record of a dialysis procedure settling a dispute between Constantine Phasoulos and the Monastery of St Panteleimon Sphrentze of the Thessalonians concerning the ownership of a piece of land lying between their properties, which is dated August 1056, mentions the hypatos, krites of the velum, of the hippodrome, of Boleron, Strymon and Thessalonike Leon Thylakas¹⁸. The litigants in this case, however, opted to have the matter settled by arbitration before the judicial decision was published¹⁹. Leon, as hypatos, krites of the velum, Boleron, Strymon and Thessalonike, also signs an act (September 1056) removing the metochion of Melissourgion from the epitropoi of the monk Kontoleon and returning it to the lavra of Iviron. According to this document, Leon had been commissioned by the Empress Theodora (1055-1056) to settle this dispute²⁰.

Documents preserved in the archives of Athonite monasteries mention another two persons who are thought to be the same Leon Thylakas²¹. The monastery of Iviron has a document issued by the patrikios, anthypatos, krites of the velum, notarios of the emperor and anagrapheus of the West, and Leon the dishypatos and anagrapheus, as one and the same raises problems relating to their titles and period of office in the particular region. However, it cannot be excluded that the dishypatos Leon and Leon Thylakas are perhaps one and the same person. If this is indeed the case, then one must assume that Leon served a second term as krites, and additionally as anagrapheus, in the same theme, following his promotion from hypatos to dishypatos. The alternative is that these are two different persons, in which case we have another instance of a judge of the velum being sent as judge to the theme of Boleron, Strymon and Thessalonike. As regards the patrikios and anagrapheus of the West, if we adopt the editors' dating of the document in which he is mentioned, i.e. 1059, then he cannot possibly be the same person as Leon Thylakas or Leon the dishypatos, since this presumes a demotion from patrikios to *dishypatos*²⁸.

A chrysobull of Nikephoros III Botaneiates concerning the Great Lavra Monastery (1081) mentions a Niketas as patrikios, krites of Boleron, Strymon and Thessalonike. Concretely, it refers to a document written by Niketas before February 1062 when, as doux of Thessalonike, Botaneiates reversed the judge's decision²⁹. This Niketas may, as N. Oikonomides thinks³⁰, perhaps be the same person as the patrikios, krites of the velum, judge of Boleron, Strymon and Thessalonike and king's man mentioned on a seal, and if this is the case he must be added to the list of those who were sent to Thessalonike after having served in Constantinople³¹.

This document also suggests that the doux of Thessalonike sometimes heard disputes or ratified judicial decisions, like the one mentioned below,

28. Moreover, the editors of the relevant documents note that the signature of the hypatos Leon (Actes d'Iviron, no. 31) is not the same as that of the patrikios Leon (Actes d'Iviron, no. 32).

which is co-signed by Botaneiates and the judge of the theme Nikolaos Serblias. In any case, the participation of the doux in court proceedings is an indication both of the fluidity prevailing in the administration of justice as regards the persons of the court officials and of the fact that from the middle of the 11th century on the doux performed military as well as civil functions³².

The Monastery of Iviron possesses a judicial decision signed by Nikolaos Serblias (August 1062) as hypatos, krites of the hippodrome, krites of the velum, krites of Boleron, Strymon and Thessalonike, and also the related report drawn up by the a secretis Petros³³. Nikolaos Serblias also appears as krites of the hippodrome and krites of the velum on a seal published by V. Laurent, which has been dated to the middle of the 11th century³⁴. Taken together, these two sources confirm that this judge's career took him from the courts of the imperial capital to those of the theme.

Another judge who was transferred from Constantinople to the theme of Boleron, Strymon, and Thessalonike was the protovestarches and krites of the velum Christophoros L..., who is recorded in a document preserved in the archives of the Monastery of Esphigmenou (1078)³⁵.

Judges of the theme, however, were not the only magistrates who heard cases in the courts of Thessalonike. The highest court in the Empire was the Imperial Court, and all citizens had the right to petition it for the settlement of a case or to hear an appeal. The emperor usually appointed imperial commissioners to hear cases, and then signed their decisions. An example of this is enshrined in a chrysobullos logos of Alexios I Komnenos (1084), according to which the emperor had mandated the protoanthypatos and krites of the hippodrome Michael Rhodios to investigate a dispute between the Great Lavra Monastery and the emperor's brother, the pansebastos protosebastos Adrianos. The judge of the hippodrome wrote a parasemeiosis, that is, a synopsis of his decision, and the monks then asked the emperor to ratify this decision with a chrysobullos logos to secure their rights, which he did³⁶.

The case of Michael Rhodios is particularly interesting, because he is mentioned in other contemporary documents as krites of Boleron, Strymon and Thessalonike. Specifically, he is cited in a chrysobull of Alexios I Komnenos of July 1104 as having been ordered by the emperor to settle a land dispute³⁷. It is thus clear that after having served as a judge in Constantinople Michael Rhodios was later transferred to Thessalonike. The information contained in the Athonite documents sheds light on his career and thus confirms that those mentioned, chiefly on seals, as judges of the velum and judges of the hippodrome and also as judges of a theme were transferred for a time from the courts of Constantinople to a provincial centre with the higher rank of judge of a theme; as we have already seen, the judges of the velum and the judges of the hippodrome were inferior judges, whereas the judges of the themes ranked as archons.

An imperial horismos from the Palaiologan era preserved in the archives of the Monastery of Zographou concerning a dispute between that foundation and the Monastery of Karakalou over the Lontzian proasteion in the region of Strymon refers to earlier documents relating to a series of disputes and examinations in which two of the judges were the *sebastophoros*³⁸, judge of the hippodrome and logariastes of the estates of the despoina (probably of Anna Dalassene³⁹) Basileios and the megalepiphanestatos kouropalates, krites of the velum, praitor and apographeus of Boleron, Strymon and Thessalonike Euthymios⁴⁰. There can be no doubt, however, that the excerpts of the documents contained in the imperial horismos date from the late 11th century and concern earlier disputes and contemporary attempts to settle them; this is further confirmed by the fact that Euthymios is cited as protokouropalates, krites of the velum, praitor and anagrapheus in a document of 1095 preserved in the Monastery of Esphigmenou⁴¹.

The evidence relating to the krites Euthymios suggests that it may be necessary to revise to some extent the assumption, based on the sources and especially on the seals, that the term praitor was used, unlike that of krites, for a person whose career was not that of a jurist⁴². The case of Euthymios shows that the titles of praitor and krites do not indicate a difference in the legal training of their bearers⁴³, since, like him, praitors could also have previously followed a judicial career and have acquired legal experience as judges of the hippodrome or of velum. Nor is this the only such case: other praitors of themes had also served as judges of the velum, as witness the praitor of Antioch Ioannes Katotikos (second or third quarter of the 11th century)⁴⁴, the praitor of Armeniakon Basileios (11th c.)⁴⁵, the praitor

The prosopographical material yielded by seals and documents (11th c.) thus leads us to the conclusion that several of the judges who were appointed to serve in Thessalonike came from Constantinople, where they had acquired both legal training and judicial experience. The administration of justice in the district of Thessalonike, as in other provinces, was organised on two levels, one on which cases were heard by the judge of the theme, and one on which they were heard by a judge from the capital who was sent out as a commissioned judge by the emperor or the central administration⁴⁸. It should also be noted that the decisions handed down by the judge of the theme could be appealed in the courts of Constantinople⁴⁹.

IN THESSALONIKE (11TH C.)*

The present study focuses on judicial officers coming from Constantinople to Thessalonike in the 11th century. The judge of the theme of Thessalonike was in charge of trying cases in the region. From the second fifth of the 11th century, however, his jurisdiction was extended to the greater financial and judicial unit of Boleron, Strymon and Thessalonike as well. Lead seals and documents from the archives of the monasteries of Athos prove that many of the krites of Boleron, Strymon and Thessalonike had been previously krites of the velum and judges of the hippodrome who performed their duties in the capital and belonged to the ranks of the “small judges”. These judicial officers tried cases that were referred to them, while they could also function as assessors of the “great” or superior judges of Constantinople, i.e. the droungarios of the vigla, the dikaiodotes, the protoasecretis, the eparchos of the city, the koiaistor and the epi ton kriseon. The latter could delegate the authority to try cases to the “small” or inferior judges. Consequently, the judges of the velum and the judges of the hippodrome could also be sent from Constantinople to the themes by the emperor or other officials, in order to examine some cases and then return to the capital. This is confirmed by the primary sources, which mention for example the case of judge of the hippodrome Michael Rhodios, who was sent by Alexios I Komnenos in 1084 from Constantinople to the region of Thessalonike, in order to examine a dispute between the Lavra monastery and the brother of the emperor, Adrianos. Some years later Michael Rhodios was sent again to try cases in Thessalonike, but this time as krites of Boleron, Strymon and Thessalonike. Consequently, apart from the judge of Boleron, Strymon and Thessalonike, other judges delegated by the emperor or by high officers could also examine cases there, as happened in other themes.
