Social Group Profiles in Byzantium: Some Considerations on Byzantine Perceptions about Social Class Distinctions

RAGIA Efi

IBR/IHR/NHRF, THE GREEK OPEN UNIVERSITY

https://doi.org/10.12681/byzsym.1213

To cite this article:

Efi Ragia

Social Group Profiles in Byzantium: Some Considerations on Byzantine Perceptions About Social Class Distinctions

Athens • 2016 • Athens
The social history of Byzantium is a relatively recent research field. This estimate is formed not because there are no studies that can be qualified as par excellence “social”, or that concern particular aspects of the social evolution of Byzantium, but because most of them are not invested with a theoretical context that is necessary when it comes to sociological research approaches. With the exception of studies by G. Ostrogorsky, H.-G. Beck, and J. Haldon1, which begin from theory to continue with data interpretation

* This paper was written as part of the postdoctoral research project entitled “Electronic Database on the Social History of Byzantium from the 6th to the 12th Centuries: Sources, Problems and Approaches”, which was implemented within the framework of the Action “Supporting Postdoctoral Researchers” of the Operational Program “Education and Lifelong Learning” (Management Agency: General Secretariat for Research and Technology), and is co-financed by the European Social Fund (ESF) and the Greek State. The program was realized at the Institute of Historical Research/NHRF from April 2012 through March 2015.

BYZANTINA ΣΥΜΜΕΙΚΤΑ 26 (2016), 309-372
–with different information, and therefore different emphasis, methodology, and conclusions–, most studies are concerned either with the economic framework –especially when it comes to the lower social strata2–, or with pressure groups, political parties and alliances at the upper echelons of society3. This schematic classification of the bibliography obviously cannot be exhaustive, with reference to methodologies and analyses, of the number of studies that have been published for the Byzantine society, and apologies are due for all those works that are not mentioned here4. It is, nevertheless, suitable to point out that for many of them, the influence of the views of G. Ostrogorsky and A. Kazhdan regarding methodology and research approach, has been huge5; as a result, there are today many studies on the upper and lower social strata, their composition and economic power, or its absence.

3. J.-Cl. CHEYNET, Pouvoir et contestations à Byzance (963-1210) [Byzantina Sorbonensia 9], Paris 1990 (hereafter CHEYNET, Pouvoir); V. VLYSSIDOU, Αριστοκρατικές οικογένειες και εξουσία (9ος-10ος αι.), Έμενες πάνω στα διαδοχικά στάδια αντιμετώπισης της αρμενοπαλαιοχριστιανικής και της καππαδοκικής αριστοκρατίας. Thessaloniki 2001 (hereafter VLYSSIDOU, Αριστοκρατικές οικογένειες); T. LOUNGHI, Η κοινωνική εξέλιξη στη διάρκεια των λεγόμενων «σκοτεινών αιώνων» (602-867), Athens 2013. An encompassing and thorough study on the enterprising groups of the empire, some of which were also in a position to exercise pressure on the governments, is still a desideratum.

4. A short report is found in the introduction of J. HALDON (ed.), The Social History of Byzantium, Chichester 2009, 2-4 (hereafter Social history). Special reference should be made to P. YANNOPoulos, La société profane dans l’empire Byzantin des VIIe, VIIIe et IXe siècles [Recueil de Travaux d’Histoire et de Philologie 6e s., Fasc. 6] Louvain 1975 (hereafter YANNOPoulos, Société profane), who chose the basic distinction between freeborn and slaves, valid also in Byzantium, as his main research tool.

This paper will not follow the usual research path. Its subject is the investigation of social profiles, as they surface in Byzantine sources and puzzle us when it comes to their interpretation and significance for the evolution of Byzantine society. Profiles compose the contour of social “position” of people or groups. They may consist of actual data and information, but also of beliefs, proclamations, behaviors and perceptions of individuals, groups or third parties. In Byzantium profiles are either recognized and accepted, or, on the other hand, are used to relegate people and groups to a different social, political, or even economic level, in which case we are dealing with the existence of “negative” profiles. In my opinion this approach is much more fitting because in Byzantium there were no delineated social boundaries, and there was no group or “class” appearing to be circumscribed within a particular set of rules, even though all of them, especially the most powerful ones, no matter how small or extended, strove for their continuation, their protection and, finally, their interests. Profiles display a multilevel function which in my opinion helps to understand Byzantine society and to appreciate different social groups within their particular contexts of action, as well as to elucidate complicated social conflicts observed in Byzantine history.

As expected, the study at hand marks not the end, but rather the beginning, of a research that is as meticulous as possible, as it strives to understand and explain the social terminology used by the Byzantines for the construction of those profiles. The groups that have been chosen here –the wealthy, the poor, the noble, the powerful and the dynasts– present

6. See for example I. ANAGNOSTAKIS, Byzantium and Hellas. Some lesser known Aspects of the Helladic Connection (8th-12th Centuries), in: Heaven and Earth. Cities and Countryside in Byzantine Greece, ed. J. ALBANI – E. CHALKIA, Athens 2013, 15-29. The profiles of the πολιτικοί and the στρατιωτικοί are two profiles that definitely serve particular political ends, but they are not included in this paper.

7. If there is a theory that closely fits the examination attempted here, then it is the theory of G. SIMMEL. Simmel perceived society as a network of social relations that are understood as constant interaction among individuals or groups, a process in which beliefs/proclamations/behaviors (modes of expression and interaction) are either accepted by other individuals or groups, or adjust according to the content they attribute to their behavior. In this framework the formation of social groups is the outcome of the individuals’ interaction on a more permanent basis. See D. FRISBY, Georg Simmel, London – New York ²2002; also see the analysis of M. ANTONOPoulos, Οι κλασσικοί της κοινωνιολογίας. Κοινωνική θεωρία και νεότερη κοινωνία, Athens 2008, 455-507.
profiles that clarify social phenomena visible in the 10th and 11th century. Unlike my previous studies that began without any preconceptions, in this case these phenomena dictated which profiles needed to be investigated, because their manipulation by the Byzantines themselves is evident in the sources. Admittedly, no profile can be analyzed exhaustively in this paper. Rather, each group is examined with regard to particular aspects of its image found in the sources, and its profile constitutes a primary research result. It is expected that future research on the social history of Byzantium, with a particular view to social group profiles, will become more detailed and will be complemented with more evidence.

I. Byzantine perceptions of “society”

It should be noted from the very beginning that the problem of “social class” in Byzantium is in reality nonexistent; the concept is modern and its definition depends even today on the circumstances to which it applies, therefore it may change from country to country (or even from region to region). The problem may appear to be one of semantics: κοινωνία, equivalent to the Latin societas in antiquity and in the middle ages, was used either as a specific legal term, or as a term that carried with it significant legal connotations. In the course of time it provided the main terminology for sociology, a modern science that flourished after the 18th century. Similar considerations apply to the term τάξις, which in modern Greek signifies -among other things- “class”. In Byzantium, however, the use of

9. Meaning relations of various types, the term κοινωνία was not rare in antiquity; its derivation from the verb κοινωνέω meant the binding, responsible and accountable participation in something. However, κοινωνία was assigned a theological connotation particularly by St. Gregory of Nyssa and St. John Chrystostom (it is found rather rarely in St. Basil and St. Athanasius); it was taken over by the neo-platonist Proclus and his student Pseudo-Dionysius, whereby it was combined with the notion of τάξις. In the Novels of the emperor Justinian I «κοινωνία» is used to describe the involvement in something -in a crime or in a procedure, see Corpus Iuris Civilis vol. III: Novellae, ed. R. Schöll - G. Kroll, Berlin 1904 (repr. Dublin/Zürich 1972), 101.29, 611.6 (hereafter CIC III). All through the early Byzantine times it is used for those joining a heresy, a meaning which is found again especially in Theodore Studites: ὀρθόδοξος κοινωνία, κοινωνία αἵρετικῶν/εἰκονομάχων/ἑτεροδόξων, see G. Fatouros (ed.), Theodori Studitae Epistulae [CFHB 31], no 13.42, 48.247, 479.46, 539.27.
The word was two-fold: it derived from the Latin equivalent ordo, which the Romans used for the separate social, political and religious bodies, but not for the Roman society in total. It also derived, as we shall see below, from Aristotelian and Neoplatonic principles that defined the function of the “state”\(^\text{10}\). That said, it becomes apparent that when we are searching for “social” terms in Byzantine sources, the obvious ones, «κοινωνία» and «τάξις» are not really those we are looking for; in reality their employment may be misleading, or even out of place.

Still, there was in Byzantium one term that described the ensemble of people within the state frame. The ancient term πολιτεία (polity) encompassed those groups of people involved in maintaining harmony in the state, helping it to function smoothly. The concept is initially inseparable from its constitutional context, which developed and flourished in the frame of the ancient πόλις. Participation in the polity was in reality a direct consequence and a legal position for citizens, with obligations, rights and privileges attached to it. However, considering a polity, meaning a state, as a group of people, meant that polity, society and “state” coincided, a basic political idea elaborated in Platonic and Aristotelian works\(^\text{11}\). Yet if this was an ideal rather than a reality already in antiquity (not each and every inhabitant of a city was a πολίτης, a member of the polity), it was much more so in early Byzantium; those who did not belong to any of the constituent groups of a «πολιτεία» lived their entire lives outside the Greek medieval bounds of Byzantine “society”, or, to put it correctly, polity. Moreover, those who did belong to a specific group were assigned a particular position and had a particular role within the context of a polity; their defining characteristics were not those of a “class” but those of their role, and conversely, their common role made them one large group. Within each of these groups, variations in position, wealth, education, duties or occupation, were very high, which meant that there was no real “social” unity; indeed, we may even speak of separate subgroups. The best example demonstrating this is probably the so-called “senatorial class”, which was a class with great disparity of status among its members12. Nevertheless, when the state employed the term Ρωμαϊκή πολιτεία, Roman polity, it appears to have comprised all its inhabitants notwithstanding social position, and not solely the groups constitutionally engaged in some administrative aspect of the polity13.

One might ask, if all these assertions are correct, what is it that describes social position in Byzantium, or what is it that describes its perception? The answer to this question cannot be simple. “Position” can only be defined by the state itself, since it corresponded to a role in the polity; roles, however, tended to readjust. The perception of social class or social position, on the other hand, is an entirely different issue, because perceptions are influenced by qualities: those assumed by the groups in their effort to assert themselves, those assigned to them by other groups in a context of social, economic and political collaboration or opposition, or those adopted by the state in its effort to overpower social and political agitations. It becomes apparent that a “group” is by definition narrower than a “class”—indeed it can only be a small fraction of a class—and this explains why we observe so many rivalries among separate groups and why it is so hard to define a “class” in Byzantium. For the profiles sketched are mostly those of state dependent groups, not of classes, and their existence can be explained by the mere fact that there was no real social, political, or legal, consolidation of a “class” in Byzantium. But a group is weaker than a class, and therefore groups are subject to change, and they can be formed and dissolved quite as easily as they appeared. It is commonly accepted that Byzantium was an empire in which vertical social mobility was feasible and sometimes even easy. “Social mobility” as defined today by sociology is not exclusively vertical, but can be horizontal or diagonal; it concerns mostly relations among people or groups of the same or slightly different standing, and their position within a social context. Nevertheless, it may be emphasized that what gives the impression

14. Cf. Beck, Konstantinopel, 16-20; IDEM, Χιλιετία, 319-349; also see ODB 2, 1371, s.v. Microstructures (A. Kazhdan), and A. Kazhdan, Small Social Groupings (Microstructures) in Byzantine Society, in XVI Internationaler Byzantinistenkongress. Akten, JÖB 32.2 (1982) 3-11. The author speaks about “microstructures” as “small social groupings”. The difference between groups and microstructures appears in my understanding to be that while microstructures are subjected to, or regulated by, a set of rules (e.g. family, guilds etc), groups are larger and they may or may not obey to rules. Guilds themselves function within a particular frame pertaining to each guild, but not to the “social class” of their members ad hoc, which explains the fact that social profiles of separate guild members differ from each other (cf. the profiles of the βάναυσοι and the ἔμποροι). On guilds see G. Maniatis, The Guild System in Byzantium and Medieval Western Europe: a Comparative Analysis of Organizational Structures, Regulatory Mechanisms, and behavioral patterns, Byz 76 (2006), 528-529, 535-543. Maniatis rightfully points out that a large number of professionals mentioned in the sources probably did not belong to any guild.

15. Daskalakes, as above n. 8, 412-414.
of “vertical mobility” is not the fact that social ascent was easy – because on the contrary it was rather difficult to break away from the social context in which they were born –, but that social role adaptation in Byzantium indeed allowed certain social upgrading (or downgrading, which is easier to find in the sources). The wide distribution of titles in the 11th century is a good example of this type of social role changing, but it required the possession of substantial amounts of gold coin for the people involved. The suspension of this policy by Alexios I Komnenos meant that the titles died with their holders, and their descendants had no chance of being included in the aristocracy of the 12th century, unless, of course, they were married into it.

“Social” and political theories in Byzantium are strongly influenced by ancient philosophy. The groups initially recognized as “social groups” had acquired a constitutional character through age-long constitutional practice during the late Roman times, and were, in Beck’s interpretation, electoral corps, such as the senate, the army and the δῆμοι of Constantinople, and later on, the Church. We only have two texts, both anonymous and coming from the 6th century, which reflect the beliefs of the Byzantines on the polity. The first is De re strategica (Περὶ στρατηγίας), which deals with the polity only in the first chapter, and the second is the treatise De scientia politica dialogus. The author of De re strategica attempts to describe the πολιτείας μέρη (constituencies of the polity) only in the introduction.

18. De re strategica has been recently attributed to the magister Syrianus as part of his Compendium. This work is placed by the researchers in the period between the late 6th–late 9th c. Discussion is still inconclusive regarding this point, but concerning our topic it will suffice to note that the first part on the polity can hardly be dated beyond the 6th-7th c.; so far this part has not been taken into consideration for dating the text.
Each μέρος was assigned a role in the polity and was placed under the supervision of a “leader”; these are the Church (ἱερατικόν), the Council members (συμβουλευτικόν), the judges (νομικόν), and the people of commerce (ἐμπορικόν), those who provided products (ὑλικόν), and those who served (ὑπηρετικόν). Given that the first part of the treatise is lost, there is no way of deciding on the hierarchical classification of these “parts of the polity”; in the second and third chapter, for example, the νομικόν and the συμβουλευτικόν are found in a reversed order following the ἱερατικόν. The author also speaks about the χρηματικόν and the τεχνικόν (construction workers); the χρηματικόν is analysed in the third part of the treatise, concerning the archons: it comprises the administrators of public finance (τῶν περὶ τὰ χρήματα τεταγμένων), the tax collectors (τοὺς φορολόγους), the financial inspectors (τοὺς ἐπισκεπτομένους) and the “distributors of nor have its sources been traced. See P. Rance, The Date of the Military Compendium of Syrianus Magister (Formerly the Sixth Century Anonymous Byzantinus), BZ 100 (2007), 701-737 with full bibliography. A general commentary on the first part on the polity is found in C. Mango, Byzantium. The Empire of New Rome, London 1980, 33; KalDellis, Byzantine republic, 15-16.

19. G. Dennis (ed.), Three Byzantine Military Treatises [CFHB 25], Washington, DC, 1985, 14.4-6 (hereafter Dennis, Three treatises): ἐπεὶ δὲ ἀνάγκῃ ἑκάστῳ τῶν εἰρημένων μερῶν ὑπ’ ἡγεμόνι τετάχθαι, ἀναγκαῖον καὶ περὶ ἀρχόντων εἰπεῖν πρότερον …

20. Dennis, Three treatises, 10. 5-14. As it is mutilated, the assemblies are not mentioned in the remaining part of the first chapter, which has the title Τί ἐστιν πολιτεία καὶ πόσα μέρη αὐτῆς.

21. Dennis, Three treatises, 12.6-21, 14.18-37. Quite interestingly, the συμβουλευτικόν, which undoubtedly concerns the senate, is placed third in the second chapter, but first after the archons (who I understand to be the higher dignitaries of the state) in the third chapter. The νομικόν, on the other hand, is listed first after the priests in the second chapter and third in the third chapter, which analyzes the qualities of the archons. This may be an indication of the increased significance of the main legislative authorities of the empire in the 6th c., meaning the prefect of the city and the quaestor sacri palatii.

22. Dennis, Three treatises, 12.14-21. The τεχνικόν does not appear again; in its place there is a group of those occupied in the sciences and technical services (ibid., 16.71-75, τοὺς περὶ τὰς ἐπιστήμας καὶ τέχνας ἀπησχολημένους). It is also not very clear what is meant with “τεχνικόν”; Dennis simply translates “technicians”; I preferred “construction workers” because craftsmen and artisans are meant with the “ὑλικόν” (ibid., 10.12: σιδηροτελεῖς, χαλκοτελεῖς).
money” (τοὺς διανέμοντας τὰ χρήματα)\textsuperscript{23}. Among these groups, only the merchants appear to be under the control of the “supervisors of trade”, meaning almost certainly the supervisors of professional corporations\textsuperscript{24}. The last categories, the ὑλικὸν and the ὑπηρετικὸν, but also the ἄχρηστον and the ἀργόν, are of particular interest. The ὑλικὸν appears to refer to people engaged in providing finished products or raw materials, and are specifically distinguished from tradesmen\textsuperscript{25}. The ὑπηρετικὸν on the other hand concerns a group that either offers its on-hire services to the polity’s archons (τοὺς δὲ ὑπηρέτας τῶν εἰρημένων ἀρχόντων), or is responsible for the transport of materials to the city\textsuperscript{26}. The last two categories are pertinent to the lower social strata, but their economic situation is of no significance for their classification by the author. The difference between the two groups is their ability to participate in the function of the polity. The ἄχρηστον are those, to whom philanthropy is extended; any natural cause, e.g. age or infirmity, makes them “useless” for the community (μηδοτιοῦν συντελεῖ πρὸς τὴν τῶν κοινῶν χρείαν)\textsuperscript{27}. But the author of \textit{De re strategica} apparently feels uncomfortable with the existence of people who are “not engaged in any activity”; they belong to the ἀργόν, a “class of the unoccupied”. The author adds: οὐ πάντως καὶ ἡμῖν ἁρμόσει μέρος πολιτείας τοιοῦτον (in my perception such a class of citizens in no way becomes us), to conclude that those without a profession “\textit{should take their place in one of the orders}” (καθ’ ἕν τῶν εἰρημένων τετάξεται), in other words, he suggests that they

\textsuperscript{23.} \textsc{dennis}, \textit{Three treatises}, 14.37-16.70.

\textsuperscript{24.} \textsc{dennis}, \textit{Three treatises}, 16.76-80.

\textsuperscript{25.} \textsc{dennis}, \textit{Three treatises}, 10.11-12, 16.81-18.87.

\textsuperscript{26.} \textsc{dennis}, \textit{Three treatises}, 10.13-14, 18.98-100. In any case there appears no personal clientele relation between the archons and the ὑπηρετικὸν, unless we reject \textsc{dennis’s} translation, “\textit{those who hire out their services}”, and we consider them to be subaltern employees of the archons instead. In this case the anonymous author would consider that employees and transporters such as the ἁρθοφόροι, ἀχθοφόροι, λιθοφόροι, belong to the same group. There is good evidence that the lower administrative staff was classified with the lower social strata, as indicated by \textit{Theodosiani Libri XVI cum Constitutionibus Sirmondianis}, ed. Th. \textsc{Mommsen}, Dublin-Zürich 1904 (repr. 1971), 14.10.3, 16.5.54.7 (hereafter \textit{C.Th.}); see the translation in C. \textsc{pharr}, \textit{The Theodosian Code and Novels and the Sirmondian Constitutions}, Princeton 1952, 415, 460, where they suffer corporal punishments and exile “\textit{since they have no respect to lose}”.

\textsuperscript{27.} \textsc{dennis}, \textit{Three treatises}, 10.14-16, 18.88-93.
should be given an employment. Noteworthy is the fact that the author is not concerned about the place of other professional groups, such as the γραμματικοί, ιατροί, γεωργοί, who are mentioned only once in the beginning of the mutilated text. It is possible that a small contribution to the function of the polity was acknowledged to them as well, or that they were included in the sphere of influence of the superior “classes”, exactly as other μέρη mentioned in the text. This particular organization of society portrayed in De re strategica reflects city structures, where the professional guilds were dominating civil life. Classification by profession was standard in Late Roman times.

The author of the second text, the De scientia politica dialogus, attributes to the city groups the term τάγματα (orders). He distinguishes the people into the sacred order (τὸ ἱερατικὸν), the optimates (ἄριστοι), and the military and civil orders, which are also called συστήματα -the term refers to professional corporations only in one instance. The authority structures spring directly from the “royal principles” (ἐκ τῶν ἐνόντων λόγων) which reflect the order of God and result in the “well-being and stability of the state” (εὐεξία τε καὶ εὐστάθεια). As in De re strategica,

---

28. DENNIS, Three treatises, 10.17-25. I rejected DENNIS' translation of this part, but I kept the translation of the phrase “class of citizens” for “μέρος πολιτείας”. Also “class of the unoccupied” I think reflects better the meaning of the text instead of “leisure class” of DENNIS.

29. DENNIS, Three treatises, 10.4.

30. E. PAPAGIANNI, Byzantine Legislation on Economic Activity Relative to Social Class, in: EHB 3, 1083-1085. The author remarks that this aspect of social categorization has not yet been adequately studied.

32. Menae patricii cum Thoma referendario De scientia politica dialogus, ed. C. M. MAZZUCCHI, Milano 2002, 31-32 (hereafter De scientia politica); BELL, Three political voices, 158.

BYZANTINA ΣΥΜΜΕΙΚΤΑ 26 (2016), 309-372
the people are categorized by profession, and all professionals, including the farmers and the humblest folk of the cities, are supervised by the optimates\(^{33}\). The author avoids to reach the point where the power of the optimates replaces that of the emperor’s, nevertheless, the role of the emperor is pushed to the background; it appears as if his presence in the text serves solely for maintaining the “order of authorities” (ταξιαρχία)\(^{34}\), which alone can guarantee the preservation of the social structure. The emperor may represent on earth an authority “similar to that of God”\(^{35}\), but this in no way requires his active involvement in the governance of the empire, which should be left to the optimates\(^{36}\). Much more than De re strategica, the Dialog is a Neoplatonic treatise, apparently with strong Pseudo-Dionysian influences, which are manifest in the particular structure of optimate power called ταξιαρχία\(^{37}\). The model, however, is not used to strengthen imperial power, but to restrain it\(^{38}\). The underlying critique reveals quite clearly the tensions between the upper classes of Byzantium and Emperor Justinian I. The anonymous author appears to be profoundly concerned with the preservation of the order of the ἄριστοι. Under the conviction that it would \(^{33}\) De scientia politica, 34-37, and 34.13-17 for the unemployed and the beggars; Bell, Three political voices, 161-164.

\(^{34}\) De scientia politica, 23.8-15; Bell, Three political voices, 149. The author translates ταξιαρχία as “political order”.

\(^{35}\) De scientia politica, 44.10-11; Bell, Three political voices, 170.

\(^{36}\) De scientia politica, 47.7-16; Bell, Three political voices, 173.

\(^{37}\) In Pseudo-Dionysius ταξιαρχία is the supreme power and authority which commands the hierarchical procession. See G. Heil and A. M. Ritter, Corpus Dionysiacum, II. Pseudo-Dionysius Areopagita, De coelesti hierarchia, De ecclesiastica hierarchia, De mystica theologia, Epistulae, Patristische Texte und Studien 67, Berlin, 2012, 22.14-22 (hereafter Pseudo Dionysius).

\(^{38}\) Bell, Three political voices, 73-76, 173 note 126, noted that the text contains “a secular equivalent of Ps. Dionysius’ similarly Neoplatonic vision”, but the imperial authority “is mediated through the levels of the secular hierarchies” and this puts “a general constraint on the imperial exercise of authority”. Also see Iodem, Social conflict in the Age of Justinian. Its Nature, Management, and Mediation, Oxford 2013, 275-277 (hereafter Bell, Social conflict); Ch. Pazdernik, Justinianic Ideology and the Power of the Past, in: The Cambridge Companion to the Age of Justinian, ed. M. Maas, Cambridge 2005, 195 (hereafter The age of Justinian), sees the text as portraying a “bureaucratic notion of the Christian oikoumene”. Also see Dvornik, as above n. 31, 707.
contribute to the recognition of their own authority, he even claims that the optimates should protect the lower orders from ill-treatment by the powerful\textsuperscript{39}, a role that had been assumed by the state itself and is quite obvious in the legislation of Justinian I.

Theoretical analyses of this type are modeled on the ideal Platonic πόλις as an institutional establishment, as a πολιτεία, even if the discussion is transferred to an empire-wide level. Thus, the author of the Dialog speaks about the “leaders of all the city orders” (τῶν τῆς πόλεως πάντων ταχυμάτων), who are responsible for electing the emperor from among the optimates\textsuperscript{40}, who, in turn, are responsible for exercising control over the lower social strata. At the time when these texts were written, however, political and “social” considerations of this type were expressions of a dying reality. Considering a “polity”, meaning a “society”, exclusively within the bounds of a city –a πόλις– was an integral part of the political and philosophical tradition of antiquity, but had little to do with real conditions. The claims of the authors lay in apparent contradiction with the existence of a central authority that overshadowed and suppressed all aspirations of individuals and groups for autonomy and personal power, and absorbed all peripheral competences for itself. “Aristocratic” self-existence was no longer maintainable, because the frame sustaining it, meaning the frame of the πόλις, was dissolving. The state had long appropriated the most important functions of the cities and had weakened the city as an institution\textsuperscript{41}. Effectively, all power derives from the center, and the emperor is no more a “primus inter pares”, no more the guarantor of the self-existing autonomous power centers of the optimates, as the anonymous author of De scientia politica would like, but, as in the Neoplatonic model, the emperor is the only source of power, which is given and taken away for specific purposes. The system no longer favored the upper social strata of the empire, as it lifted the privileges attached to \textsuperscript{40} De scientia politica, 30.10-12.

\textsuperscript{41} The development is a result of the decay of city administration. See A. JONES, The Greek City from Alexander to Justinian, Oxford 1940, 147-155; IDEM, LRE, 535-542.
personal distinction in the provinces and confined them to those involved in active administration. The Novels of Justinian I show that there was no way to impose the involvement of local magnates in city management, and the archaeological material suggests that they were abandoning their civic residences in favor of their provincial villas. It appears that the upper social strata of the empire would soon be in the need to modify the ways of their social self-projection.

II. Basic “social” distinctions found in the legislation

In her seminal work on poverty, Évelyne Patlagean maintains that the basic social distinction of the Roman empire into honestiores and humiliores developed through time into a general distinction between rich and poor in middle Byzantium. According to this theory, the distinction was maintained in the legislation of Justinian I, and poverty, as portrayed in the punishments reserved for the poor in the Roman laws, reflects a real condition of social weakness against the influence of the rich and powerful.

This theory has deeply affected scholarly approach regarding social class divisions in Byzantium, but needs to be revised for two reasons, firstly, because Roman legislation has been closely investigated recently regarding “social” distinctions found in it, and secondly, because an unprejudiced

42. Jones, LRE, 535-542; Dragron, Γέννηση, 188-195. P. Brown, Power and Persuasion in Late Antiquity: Towards a Christian Empire, Wiskonsin 1992, 71-117 argues that bishops filled in the void created by the retreat of the civic upper social strata, a development facilitated by the function of the Church as a major benefactor of the poor. The transformation of civic euergetism into euergetism targeting the poor is an idea elaborated by the same author in Poverty and Leadership in the Later Roman Empire, Hanover – London 2002, 1-44 (hereafter Brown, Poverty).

43. H. Saradi, Από την καθημερινότητα του πρωτοβυζαντινού αριστοκράτη, in: Βυζαντινό κράτος και κοινωνία. Σύγχρονες κατευθύνσεις της έρευνας, NHRF, Athens 2003, 72-85; see generally Jones, LRE, 757-763.

44. Patlagean, Pauvreté, 10-11. See, however, the critique of J. Haldon, On the Structuralist Approach to the Social History of Byzantium, BSI 42 (1981), 203-211. Also see Alfoldy, Ιστορία, 190-196, 277, 302-308, 345-349, who argues for a leveling of distinctions among different groups of the lower social strata that led to an assimilation of the humiliores with the plebs and the coloni. Also see Brown, Poverty, 7-8, 52-54: “this view from the top gives way to a picture of the population... as built up by layer upon layer of humble persons”.

BYZANTINA SYMMEIKTA 26 (2016), 309-372
inspection of the texts examined by Patlagean produces different results, especially when it comes to the interpretation of the laws.

In the second and third centuries the Roman empire used the honestiores-humiliores distinction in such vague contexts that required no further specification. The division therefore did not serve any particular purposes and it is not easy to decide which person belonged to which category, unless this detail is included in a source\(^45\). In judicial procedures this general social classification is not evoked as a direct cause of punishment, but rather, punishment is a secondary consequence, even though different sets of punishments are predicted for the honestiores and humiliores\(^46\). A more detailed examination of the condicio of persons is part of any normal court procedure. “Social position” in Roman times was determined by one’s participation in overlapping circles of political, religious and economic character, which preconditioned particular rights and obligations for their members and established their condicio, in reality their social, and, specifically for the court, their legal status, such as senator/decurio, free/freedman or slave, patronus, public servant (whereby one belonged to the Roman militia) or not\(^47\). When it comes to legal responsibility, individuals are equally examined for their liability independently of their status, e.g. in case of testifying, because moral standards are attached to each condition\(^48\).

\(^{45}\) R. RILINGER, Zeugenbeweiss und Sozialstruktur in der Römischen Kaiserzeit, in: Idem, Ordo und Dignitas, 239-243 (hereafter RILINGER, Zeugenbeweiss), points out that the comparative of honestus is found only three times in Justinian’s Codex.

\(^{46}\) R. RILINGER, Humiliores – Honestiores. Zu einer sozialen Dichotomie im Strafrecht der römischen Kaiserzeit, München 1988, 56-60, 63-64 (hereafter RILINGER, Humiliores-honestiores). In other words, it is nowhere mentioned that a penalty is imposed because an individual is classified as honestior or humilior.

\(^{47}\) R. RILINGER, Humiliores-honestiores, 51-56, 110-111. Other types of condicio may be found in the early sources, relating to wealth (defined by census in Rome), birth (patrician, plebeian or other), citizenship (coming from Rome, Italy or allied cities etc); in sum, these distinctions defined the political rights of a person and attainment of honors. JONES, LRE, 519, believed that the distinction was generally inconsequential, as even the professionals could claim the status of honestior, at least in a court of law. When it came to conferring justice, it was left to the judge to decide if one of the litigants belonged to the humiliores or not, in which case he would suffer the punishment predicted for his case.

In this context, some categories are excluded from bringing actions to court, and others are not admitted as witnesses. These categories overlap only partly because of their condicio, not because of their social standing per se. It follows that confusing these groups and generalizing to the point of considering that all humiliores were poor is an oversimplification that perplexes any attempt to decipher the complex relations among separate social groups in Byzantium. The simplest example demonstrating this would be the assimilation of the infames with the humiliores and, for this reason, with the poor. But the infames were a clearly legal, not social, category; people of any social “class” could be stigmatized with infamia (ignominy), therefore the infames cannot even be considered a “social group”.

The perception of such socio-legal distinctions is best followed in the laws relating to penalties and witnesses. In a law dated to 414, the handling of the upper social strata is extended: it is distinguished into private persons and dignitaries (personis singulis et dignitatibus), followed by proconsulares, vicarii... and comites primi ordinis; a separate category is composed of honoratos reliquos, which relates to senatores and decemprimi curiales. The last category is the city decuriones. In contrast, the lower social strata, generally marked as “kinds of people” are simply divided in slaves and coloni (servos et colonos... generibus hominum). In a similar law of 412 that distinguishes among illustres, spectabiles and clarissimi, there is also mention of the plebs. A law comprised in the Digesta of Justinian I contains pairs of social opposites: decurions-plebeians, honorable-dishonorable, rich and poor. The legislator in this law was much more concerned with someone’s legal position and way of life – the condicio– rather than with a particular “social” standing. The general distinction between decurions and plebeians is often found in the Codex of Theodosius, but the distinction between rich and poor is not common –more often than not poverty appears in the sources as a cause of unlawfulness or of lack of moral content in a person, but not of social status.

The concern about the liability of witnesses with the intention to safeguard and reinforce the unobstructed dispensation of justice is particularly evident in Justinian’s Novel 90 On witnesses. In this Novel Justinian I explains that previous laws barring witnesses from testifying were abused, and for this reason he intends to clarify which categories of people and under what circumstances they should be excluded from giving testimony. The

51. Jones, LRE, 526; Dagron, Γέννηση, 217-218. The comites were a particular order of “imperial companions”, with specific duties, or simply holders of the corresponding honorary title who entered the order. This class grew in the 4th c., but the title still gave precedence in the sacrum consistorium and in the senate; its bestowal included senatorial rank for those who did not already have it.

52. C.Th, 16.5.52, 16.5.54.3, 4, 7, 8; Alfoldy, Ιστορία, 326; Dagron, Γέννηση, 194. The lower staff of dignitaries (officiales) also belonged to the lower social strata as mentioned above, n. 26; the priests were counted in the second category with the civic magistrates. On the prohibition against heretics to appear at court see D. Simon, Untersuchungen zum Justinianischen Zivilprozess, München 1969, 239-240 (hereafter Simon, Zivilprozess).

53. Digesta, 22.5.3: Testium fides... in persona eorum exploranda... in primis condicio cuiusque utrum quis decurio an plebeius sit... an honestae et inculpatae vitae... an vero notatus quis et reprehensibilis... an locuples vel egens sit, ut luceri causa quid facile admittat. Extensive commentary on this important law is found in Rilinger, Zeugenbeweiss, 243-251.

55. CIC III, no 90, 445.16-446.2.
emperor maintains that witnesses should be chosen among people “with a good reputation” (εὖυπολήπτους δεῖν εἶναι τοὺς μάρτυρας), and explains that this group includes the title holders, those who have a position in state service and those who are known for their wealth or their profession (διὰ τὸ τῆς ἀξίας ἢ στρατείας ἢ εὐπορίας ἢ ἐπιτηδεύσεως ἀναμφισβήτητον). This part may be easily interpreted as projecting a social distinction generally based on wealth, but such an interpretation is an oversimplification, for the emperor continues with specifying the groups that are excluded from a judicial process: the circus people, the “lowly” and the unknown (μή τινας ἐπιδιφρίους μηδὲ χαμερπεῖς μηδὲ παντοτῶς ἀσήμους... Εἰ δὲ ἣγνωστοι τίνες εἶναι καὶ ἀπαντάχρονοι ἀφανεῖς...). The circus/hippodrome people in the Roman empire were stigmatized with permanent infamia. The main consideration of the law of Justinian was the ability of the witnesses to prove, even through the testimony of others, that they were reliable and led a respectable life, which was considered as proof of honesty (ὑπ’ άτέρων γοῦν ὅτι καθεστάσσιν ἀξιόπιστοι μαρτυρούμενοι). The latter category, the “unknown”, is the ἀφανεῖς or ἄγνωστοι of the Greek sources. Even though an effort has been made to equate this category with the infames or the poor, the equation cannot stand. The Greek equivalent of the infames would be ἄτιμοι or ἄσημοι, as opposed to ἄντιμοι, ἐντιμότεροι, which is the Greek translation of

57. CIC III, no 90, 446.21-30.
58. CIC III, no 90, 446.30-33. These are subjected to torture in case they are suspected for corrupting the process.
59. PATLAGEAN, Pauvreté, 14-17, believes that the infames are assimilated to the humiliores, therefore they are excluded from a court procedure; Eadem, La pauvreté à Byzance au temps de Justinien: les origines d’un modèle politique [Études sur l’histoire de la pauvreté (Moyen Âge – XVle siècle) I], ed. M. MOLLAT, Paris 1974, 59-81, here 59-67 (hereafter PATLAGEAN, La pauvreté) [ Eadem, Structure sociale, famille, chrétieneté à Byzance, VR, London 1981, no I; hereafter PATLAGEAN, Structure sociale]; H. KRUMPHOLZ, Über Sozialstaatliche Aspekte in der Novellengesetzgebung Justinians [Habild Dissertationsdrucke, Reihe Alte Geschicte 34], Bonn 1992, 26-27 (hereafter KRUMPHOLZ, Aspekte); RILINGER, Humiliores-honestiores, 110-112, notes that there is no explicit prohibition against the infames to bring actions to court; however, I might add, as in the case of the poor which is discussed below, this would expose them to attacks on the part of the prosecuted that could effect the annulment of the trial.
honestiores. The criterion for being relegated to the ἄγνωστοι appears to be the lack of permanent residence, resulting from unemployment. Employment would have effected the registration of a person in a catalogue of professional workers or farmers, after which the person would be no longer “unknown”. One wonders if the “unknown” are a forerunning distinction for the ἄγνωστοι καὶ ἀνεπίγνωστοι τῷ δημοσίῳ (completely unknown to the public fisc)60, found in archival documents after the 10th century. In my opinion they are, and the Novel of Justinian I distinctly distinguishes the infames from the “unknown and those who are nowhere to be seen”. Thus, we are dealing with separate groups of Byzantine society, and not simply with “the poor”61.

A text of the 7th century containing penalties imposed on heretics is most elucidating regarding the social divisions that the state recognized. It was included in the Acts of the Lateran Council, and dates from 64962. The change in the Byzantine perception of “society” since the early 5th century is most obvious in this stipulation, even though already anticipated in the Novels of Justinian I. Four large groups are mentioned along with the penalties that were deemed appropriate for their status. The first is, as expected, the clergy of all grades, followed by the monks, a group normally held outside the Byzantine polity because of its members’ deliberate retreat from the world63. The second is the large group of state servants: εἰ δὲ ἀξίαν ἢ ζώνην ἢ στρατείαν ἔχοιεν, γυμνωθήσονται τούτων (if they hold title, office or service, they shall be deprived of it). The translation of the terms used in this sentence varies: ἀξία may be interpreted as “title” or “function”, ζώνη as “title/function” but also as military service64, στρατεία

60. G. Ostrogorski, Quelques problèmes d’histoire de la paysannerie Byzantine [Corpus Bruxellense Historiae Byzantinae, Subsidia II], Bruxelles 1956, 36.
61. Also Simon, Zivilprozess, 239: “die Unbekannten, …die ohne festen Wohnsitz sind”.
62. Concilium Lateranense a. 649 Celebratum, ed. R. Riedinger [ACO Series Secunda vol. I], Berolini 1984, 210.6-15. I sincerely thank the senior researcher of the IBR/NHRF, Dr. Maria Leontsini, for bringing this important text to my knowledge.
64. As indicated by Procopius regarding simple soldiers, see Historia quae dicitur Arcana. Procopii Caesariensis Opera Omnia, ed. J. HAURY – G. WIRTH, v. 3, Leipzig 1963, 146.3-6 (hereafter Procopius, Hist. arc.).
as “military service” as well as “any state service”. In any case, these terms denote the state dependent groups of dignitaries of any rank and those who provided their services either in the military or in the political and civil sector. The last group is the private persons, ἱδιῶται. In Byzantium the term ἱδιώτης is conceived in a twofold manner: it may signify the person who leads a private life away from public affairs, but also (in some texts) the person who serves in the political sector of the administration. Here the context applies to the first; the ἱδιῶται are thus distinguished into ἐπίσημοι (notables) and ἀφανεῖς (unknown). We understand that the ἐπίσημοι are individuals with assets, and their wealth is confiscated in case they are found heretics. The ἀφανεῖς, as explained above, are the exact opposite. They are not marked for their wealth because they have no assets in the form of movable or immovable possessions, therefore they remain “unknown”; if they are found to be heretics, they would simply have to suffer corporal punishment and exile.

The testimonies examined so far suggest that a change occurred in the social perception of the Byzantines, which became clearer between the 6th and the 7th centuries and is expressed in the abrogation of the limits among different groups of Byzantine society. This change is manifest mostly in the upper social strata that are no longer divided among the earlier ordines of comites, decuriones, honorati, etc. By the time of Justinian I, but more clearly in the 7th century, the real social section is found there, where a subject of the empire entered public service, or, to put it clearly, entered the state payroll or became eligible for a certain privilege in return for provided services. This division is not new, it is of Roman provenance, but it is all that is maintained in middle Byzantium. State service is conceived as a condition to which a set of privileges is attached; the removal of militia/στρατεία causes the political, economic and ultimately the social debasement of the individual who serves. An important observation of major significance is that “nobility”, εὐγένεια, and poverty, πενία have no consequences for the distinctions that the state acknowledged. Poor people with moderate or small fortunes would be counted with the ἰδιῶται, not with the ἀφανεῖς. This simplified classification does not mean that separate social groups were reduced to nothingness. On the contrary, I suggest that the Byzantine “social” perception expanded to include everybody, notwithstanding wealth, position, nobility; individuals of noble or humble birth, rich or poor, large or medium landowners, dependent farmers or professionals without any land at all might be included in either category. The levelling of social distinctions among different social groups in the 6th-7th centuries led to a restructuring of separate groups’ roles in, and self-projection to, society. However, the most important consequence of this development is, in my appreciation, the claim laid by the state to the lower social strata, the protection of which was usurped from the aristocracy; this becomes amply clear in the prooimion of the Ecloga.

In this text the legislator brings two socially opposite groups into contrast in the same context; the πένητες (the poor) and the δυνάσται (the dynasts)67. What follows is to a point a word by word copy from St. Basil, who had used the substantive participles πλεονεκτοῦντες (the avaricious), ὑπερέχοντες (the superior) and ἁδικούμενον (the injured). St. Basil was proclaiming that the superior should not be deprived more than the amount of damage they had inflicted on the aggrieved (ἐπανισοῦν αὐτοὺς ἵστασθαι καὶ τοσοῦτον ἀφαιρεῖν τοῦ ὑπερέχοντος ὅσον ἐλαττούμενον εὑρωσι τηνικαῦτα τὸν ἁδικούμενον)68. This formulation is in accordance with the late Roman idea of justice, which accommodated the existence of wealth, often immense, in a Christian context. In fact, it was St. Basil who exposed the desire of the rich for more possessions and elaborated on avarice; but, so long as the wealthy abstain from obtaining more riches, assets and means, provided that they care for the situation of their people and channel their financial aid to the poor –no more to society in general–, wealth is exonerated. In this idea the existence of wealth and the wealthy, and, consequently, the continuation of social inequality, were unexpectedly justified\textsuperscript{69}. However, the author of the \textit{Ecloga} was not absolutely pleased with St. Basil’s notion of justice, he therefore framed it in a background of marked conflict of the socially powerful – the dynasts – with the socially weak – the poor: “\textit{neither despise of the poor, nor allow the dynast to act unrestrained}” (μήτε πένητος καταφρονεῖν μήτε δυνάστην ἐὰν ἀνεξέλεγκτον). The legislator expands the principle of justice by interweaving with it the idea that administering justice is not compatible with discrimination which derives from, or is founded on, money, partiality, enmity or fear of dynasty (ἢ χρήμασι διεφθαρμένοι ἢ φιλίᾳ χαριζόμενοι ἢ ἐχθραν ἀμυνόμενοι ἢ δυναστείαν δυσωπούμενοι). This suggestion is specifically directed to the judges, who, in case they have committed such a mistake, are unqualified to confer judgment (κρίμα κατευθύνειν οὐ δύνανται).

68. PG 31, 405A-B (in his homily Εἰς τὴν ἀρχὴν τῶν παροιμιῶν – In principium proverbiorum).

BYZANTINA ΣΥΜΜΕΙΚΤΑ 26 (2016), 309-372

The \textit{Ecloga}, however, is not all that innovating. In spite of the fact that it is distanced from the Roman legislation with respect to dispensing justice as a fundamental principle of equity of the people before the law and not as a task that simply burdens the administration of the empire\textsuperscript{70}, the stipulation on witnesses is only a summary of Justinian’s \textit{Novel 90}. But a few years later in the same century, the related Novel of the empress Irene makes no reference

\footnotesize
\begin{enumerate}
\item The institution of state salary for employees of justice is of capital importance for the development of the judicial system, because the Roman judicial system favored phenomena of bribery and therefore nourished class distinctions. TROIANOS believes specifically that the tendency to suppress class distinctions is particularly evident in the criminal law of the \textit{Ecloga}, and SIMON concludes that the \textit{Ecloga} institutes “eine ausführliche richterliche Standesethik”. See Sr. TROIANOS, \textit{Οι πηγές του Βυζαντινού Δικαίου}, Athens-Komotene 2011, 162-168 (hereafter TROIANOS, \textit{Πηγές}); IDEM, \textit{Οι ποινές}, 37; \textit{Ecloga}, 9-10; D. SIMON, Gesetzgebung als Weltordnung und Rechtsordnung. Die Auffassungen der byzantinischen Kaiser von Justinian I. bis zu Leon VI vom Zweck der Gesetze, \textit{Επετηρίς του Κέντρου Ερεύνης της Ιστορίας του Ελληνικού Δικαίου} 31 (1995), 35-39 (hereafter SIMON, Gesetzgebung). See, however, PATLAGEAN, \textit{Pauvreté}, 16-17: “la legislation isaurienne affirme la correspondance entre la condition sociale et le statut juridique”; in her opinion the penalties of criminal law are calculated on a purely economic scale. HALDON, \textit{Byzantium}, 276-280, speaks of “the breakdown of the traditional legalistic framework of the Roman state in the seventh century”, in which status and wealth defined justice.
\end{enumerate}
to the category of the “unknown”, the ἅφανεῖς. With this development Byzantium leaves its Roman social past behind. The disappearance of the last social category from the legislation of the period represents the last step towards a uniform comprehension of society, one that makes the lower social strata a clear target of imperial protection against those who constantly expanded their own financial, political and social power. In some respect, this development reflects Byzantium’s recognition of the weaker groups’ subsistence right outside the social influence circles of the group called “the powerful”; in reality, as the Ecloga indicates, it appears to be directly targeting at the patronage and clientele social organization of Roman times.

III. The “powerful” and the dynasts

It has already been pointed out that the difference between the Roman and the Byzantine perception of social distinctions is manifest in the terminology of the legislation. There is one more, actually major, distinction that needs to be elucidated, and that is the one that concerns the δυνατοὶ (the powerful) and the δυνάσται (the dynasts). The use of these terms reproduces conceptions of power and its exercise, and therefore concerns the awareness individuals had of their own role, as well as the perception of that role by other individuals or by the state. To make it clear from the beginning, the Greek language until the 10th century attributed no specific social meaning to the term δυνατός. Its use in the Novels of Justinian is influenced by Roman legislation, because δυνατός is the direct translation of potens. The potentes, potentiores or potentissimi are a dominant group in...

71. Ecloga, 14.1; L. Burgmann, Die Novellen der Kaiserin Eirene, FM 4 (1981), 20.54-58: ...μαρτύρων ἀξιοπίστων, ἱερέων, ἀρχόντων, στρατευομένων, πολιτευομένων, ἐν ἐπιτηδείᾳ ἐχόντων εὐσεβῶς δηλονότι καὶ ἐν ἐνελαβεῖσε βιοῦντω... It is a good question which sources the legislator used here for the composition of the social spectrum included in the law of Irene, since the term πολιτευόμενοι refers to city decuriones, who are mentioned in earlier laws of the 5th c. included in the Digesta (i.e. in 22.5.3). It is highly questionable, but not totally dismissible, that the city curiae, or more probably some similar political corps with or without a constitutional role, still existed in the cities in the late 8th c. See commentary of the stipulation of Irene in: A. Kazhdan – M. McCormick, The Social World of the Byzantine Court, in: Byzantine Court Culture, 170 (hereafter Kazhdan-McCormick, Byzantine court); Kazhdan-Ronchey, Aristocrazia, 67; Haldon, Senatorial elite, 228; Patlagean, Pauvreté, 17.
Roman legislation; their characteristic is not primarily one of social status, since they may well come from different classes of Roman society, but the exercise of power—which, can be, occasionally, delegated by the emperor, or more accurately, of abuse and violence (vis), against the socially inferior (inferiores, humiliores)\(^72\). St. Basil the Great targets their avarice and their rapacity, but the term δυνατος in general is not frequent in Byzantine narrative sources, which use the term δυνάστης instead of potens.

The Novels of Justinian I follow the Roman legal tradition and draw a complete profile of the δυνατοι: they are distinctly differentiated from the archons, who represent state authority in the provinces; when their activity is centered in cities, it is placed under the jurisdiction of the ἔκδικοι (defensores)\(^73\). However, it was not the civic aspect that worried the government, but their activities in the provinces, and indeed in those provinces in which civic civilization was not embedded in antiquity, such as Paphlagonia, Lycaonia, Cappadocia and others\(^74\). The δυνατοι in Justinian’s legislation are

---

72. J. Schlumberger, Potentes and Potentia in the Social Thought of Late Antiquity, in: Tradition and Innovation in Late Antiquity, ed. F. Clover – R. Humphreys, Wisconsin 1989, 90-104; Kazhdan-Ronchet, Aristocrazia, 64, 68 (the author disagreed with that view); in a different spirit see Patlagean, Ἐλληνικός μεσαίωνας, 254-255, and more schematically Dagon, Γέννησι, 194, 208, 218. Also see M. Reasoner, The Strong and the Weak. Romans 14:1-15:13 in: Context [Society for New Testament Studies, Monograph Series 103], Cambridge 1999, 45-63. The potentes appear in the sources already under the Roman republic. According to Schlumberger, “potentia”, apart from potentia Caesaris or summa potentia, almost always carries “the stigma of abuse attached to it”. It becomes part of the Roman aristocratic ideal when the actual power that comes from the possession of riches is meant, but generally the potentes are not an “easily delineated social group”. See also H. Saradi, On the “Archontike” and “Ekklesiastike Dynasteia” and “Prostasia” in Byzantium with Particular Attention to the Legal Sources: A Study in Social History of Byzantium, Byz 64 (1994), 69-117, 314-351, where, however, the powerful are not distinguished from the dynasts and δυναστεία is interpreted as “oppression by the archons”, who may belong to any category “honestiores, potentiores, δυνατοί”. This is a thorough study with a lot of information from the earlier and later periods.

73. CIC III, no 15, 111.36-39: …ἀλλὰ καὶ πρᾶτειν, ἀπερ ἐν τίς βουληθεῖν, καὶ ἔκδιδόναι, μὴ εἰ τὸ πραιτόμενον ἀποτε τοῦ τῆς ἐπιφυγίας ἄρχοντας ἢ τινος τῶν δύνατον μηδὲ τοῦτο κωλύειν. Also very specific is the distinction between archons and δυναστεία in the edict on Phocion Libanensis, see edict no 4, 762.29-31.

74. CIC III, no 25 (Lycaonia), 29 (Paphlagonia), 30 (Cappadocia). In the case of Arabia, Novel 102, 493.39 mentions the οἶκοι δύνατοι. Scattered references to the powerful often very rich; their wealth allows them to maintain retinues of armed men (δορυφόροι, πλήθος ἀνθρώπων οὐ φορητόν –bodyguards, a mob of awful people)⁷⁵ and to buy the silence of state authorities (τοῦ στόματος αἰτοῖς ἐμφραττομένου χρυσίῳ –their mouth is choked up with gold), that turned a blind eye to the appropriation of state and imperial properties⁷⁶. Quite often their activity is no different than that of bandits, as they regularly raided villages, to the detriment of peasant cultivators. The province of Lycaonia, according to the official perception, “belonged to powerful men” (ἀνδρῶν γάρ ἐστιν ισχυρῶν); they were able “riders and archers” disregarding the civil and military authorities, a phenomenon that the emperor attributed to the loose reinforcement of the rules, which made the law “not equally menacing to the most insolent” (φοβερὸν οὐχ ὁμοίως τοῖς θρασυτέροις)⁷⁷.

We owe this detailed profile of the powerful and their ways of operation in the 6th century to the Novels of Justinian. The profile of the dynasts, on the other hand, is not that clear⁷⁸. The terms δυνάστης and δυναστεία are particularly frequent in the Scriptures, where they are juxtaposed with the πένητες. But in the Greek language they carry specific connotations, which, unlike the Latin term potentes, are of political and social content and include conceptions about authority and power⁷⁹. Thus, a dynast in a Greek perception is almost without exception one whose authority is officially recognized either by the state or by his own people or subjects, therefore a dynasty can even be a king; in this respect it is important that the kings of the Hellenistic period are quite often dynasts⁸⁰, and their authority is perceived as absolute and sometimes oppressive. In this context a dynast may

---

⁷⁵. CIC III, no 30, 228.9-13.
⁷⁶. CIC III, no 30, 228.19-25.
⁷⁷. CIC III, no 25, 196.42-197.13.
very well be someone with a state function or title, or simply a rich person who possesses the means to implement his goals. The sources contrast the dynasts with the poor (πένητες, πτωχοί), by charging the first with avarice and exercise of violence against the latter\(^{81}\). Thus the δυνάσται of the Greek sources are distinguished for their wide social influence and for their social and political status, but their power is often oppressive and injurious to the socially weak. In the Life of St. Symeon the Salos we find: “patrons, whom you need against the dynasts, are good” (καλοὶ οἱ προστάται, οὓς ἔχετε ἐν ἀνάγκῃ πρὸς τοὺς δυνάστας)\(^{82}\), and in the Life of Philaretos, the neighbors who appropriated the saint’s land are recognized as dynasts, but also Philaretos himself is a dynast for the people of the king, because his residence gives the impression that he is a man of considerable means\(^{83}\).

The use of these terms by the writers of Byzantium is a matter of perception. Dynasts are incriminated when they operate outside the frame of the law. “A man who possesses dynasty but is not without means is unjustified when sinning by doing injustice”, wrote Patriarch Photios\(^{84}\). In the same direction the Eisagoge aucta, a legislative compilation dated to between the 10th and the 11th century, contains a stipulation that possession of dynasty is no reason for evasion of legal consequences, which can be lifted only by imperial decree\(^{85}\). The tenth century legislation is indeed innovative with respect to the exercise of dynasty, because it acknowledges that it can be exerted by those who are not dynasts by themselves, but are simply friends of dynasts and have the right “to speak freely” to them (κἂν μὴ δι’ ἑαυτῶν, ἀλλ’ οὖν διὰ τῆς ἑτέρων δυναστείας πρὸς οὓς πεπαῤῥησιασμένος ὀχείωνται). Finally, the emperor Basil II underlined in the Novel of 996 that dynasty is bequeathed from generation to generation (τὴν δυναστείαν διαδεχομένων), meaning that the state acknowledged that dynasty is basically a family affair.

It is rather difficult to distinguish in the sources the power of individuals or families that existed independently of the emperor. For Byzantium we maintain the impression mostly of a centralized state, in which all developments evolved around the court and the emperor, with his tolerance at least, if not at his will and not with his own involvement. And it was really such a state; the competition for the possession of titles, offices and the corresponding remunerations has been well described in modern research. But I need to draw attention to some details relating clearly how this type of authority was exercised by the δυνάσται of Byzantium. Philaretos’ family apparently had no connections with Constantinople - at least this is what his Life’s author would have us believe, and here I accept this convention for the sake of argument. The peasants in his village, as well as others, such as the soldier Mousoulios, run to him with their problems, and he was always willing to help with whatever came up. When the people of the emperor

86. N. SVORONOS, Les novelles des empereurs Macédoniennes concernant la terre et les stratiotes, ed. posthume P. GOUNARIDIS, Athènes 1994, no 2.I.83-84 (hereafter SVORONOS, Novelles). Also see below.

87. SVORONOS, Novelles, 14.I.30-31: ...τῶν αὐτοῦ διαδόχων διαδόχων μετὰ τῆς περιουσίας καὶ τὴν δυναστείαν διαδεχομένων... Cf. ibid., 14.II.22-23: ...τὴν δυναστείαν αὐτοῦ καὶ εὐημερίαν εἰς τοὺς διαδόχους αὐτοῦ παραπέμψει...

89. See Life of St. Philaretos, 26-28 for discussion.

90. Life of St. Philaretos, 72.223-74.247.

91. Philaretos’ philanthropy is already mentioned in the beginning of the text, to prejudice numerous episodes that follow. See Life of St. Philaretos, 62.26-33; C. LUDWIG, took the decision to stay at his house, the villagers again appeared with gifts that allowed Philaretos to extend to them a splendid hospitality\(^92\). This is, perhaps, the good side of dynasty; the text only reveals to us some aspects of the real social influence of people with means on the practical level of daily life. Many more details are included in the Strategikon of Kekaumenos, a text in which the author never uses the terms δυνάστης-δυναστεία to denote the authority of the powerful. On the contrary, the term is employed to describe the person who pursues those activities that the tenth century Novels condemn; such is, for example, the case of Noah, “who happened to be a dynast in Demetrias” and appropriated the land of the locals\(^93\).

Still, for Kekaumenos, autonomous authority of local archons in the provinces is non-negotiable and independent. The emperor, who is pushed to the background of the narrative, is but a distant figure even when his authority is advocated in the provinces by his officers\(^94\). In this case, however, the archons are not characterized as dynasts. They are the ones to whom “the people of the country obey”\(^95\), even if they “stay at home”, with no official relation to the central authorities (εἰ καὶ ἐν οἰκίᾳ ἰδιάζεις, ὑποτάσσεται δὲ σοι ὁ λαὸς τῆς χώρας)\(^96\), which means that they hold no title or office\(^97\). Social influence is manifest in the fact that the people of the country appeal to the authority of a local archon in their dealings with officers of the civil or military administration. These may relate to any affair, but in particular they concern the assessment of taxes. They claim to the local archon that “you are

\(^{92}\) Life of St. Philaretos, 84.411-415.

\(^{95}\) It is not clear in the text whether these people were dependent or independent farmers of the region. The fact that it is not specified indicates that those who sought the protection of local people with influence might have belonged to either category.

\(^{96}\) SpadaRo, Raccomandazioni, ch. 3, 133.1-2.

\(^{97}\) Kazhidan-RoncHeY, Aristocrazia, 133.
our master” (ἡμεῖς σὲ ἔχομεν αὐθέντην)\textsuperscript{98}. But in the text of Kekaumenos, the most important aspect of that influence is their ability to intervene in cases of dispute among peasants; their authority to pass judgment is accepted and recognized. A local archon may intimidate somebody (ἐκφοβῶν), provide advice (νουθέτει), impose fines (διὰ ζημίας) or even corporal punishments (διὰ δαρμοῦ) and humiliate (μετὰ ὕβρεως καὶ ὀνειδισμοῦ) the disobedient\textsuperscript{99}. Still, Kekaumenos advises that one must be very careful when settling disputes in his region, because he might in the process alienate the friends (φίλους), comrades (συντρόφους) and like-minded (ὁμόφρονας) of those that he finds on the wrong side, his decisions might therefore turn against him and this might bring upon him loss of recognition, reputation, and in the end, power or even his life\textsuperscript{100}. In this context a local dispute might in fact be settled without the intervention of central administration officers. The texts of Philaretos and Kekaumenos suggest that the dynasty of local archons is a reciprocal relation of the dynast with his “subjects”, a de facto exercise of authority which is accepted by the people and entails mutual concessions and obligations. A dynast might in fact be alienated from his power base, but there is no dynast without his people.

Imperial service enhances dynastic authority on a local level and opens the way to its expansion empire-wide. Bardas Skleros is a well-known archon \textsuperscript{98} SpadaRo, Raccomandazioni, ch. 3, 98.1. It is quite characteristic that it is specifically mentioned in the previous section (3, 97), that there is a “supreme captain in the region” (ὑπερέχουσα κεφαλὴ εἰς τὸν τόπον), towards whom Kekaumenos advices caution.

\textsuperscript{99} SpadaRo, Raccomandazioni, ch. 3, 134.1-3, 15-19: χρή οὖν εἶναι σε δίκαιον εἰς ἄκρον καὶ ἀληθῆ, πλὴν τοὺς ἁμαρτάνοντας τοιουτώ τρόπῳ κάλαξε· τοὺς μὲν οὐ κάλαξε καὶ τιμῶρει... τοὺς δὲ λοιποὺς λόγοις ἀμυνητηρίους ἐκφοβοῦν διορθοῦ, ἄλλους δὲ μετὰ καλοθείς καὶ ἠμερότητος νουθέτει ὡς παθή πάθεσεα ἴδιον, καὶ ὁποίοι καὶ τὴν ἁδικίαν ὑπενώθην ἀναπτείλει καὶ στενώτερον ἀνώτερον διατηρήσαι πάσης ἐπομολύνης Θεοῦ χάριτι. Also Ibid., ch. 3, 137.11-15: ἐπελθεί αὐτοῖς σοφὼς καὶ μετὰ τρόπον σωφρόνισον αὐτούς, οὕς μὲν διὰ ζημίας οὗς δὲ διὰ δαρμοῦ, ἄλλους δὲ μετὰ ὕβρεως καὶ ὀνειδισμοῦ, τοὺς δὲ λοιποὺς μετὰ τρόπον χρηστοῦ, ἑπὶ αὐδαναπτὸν τοιοῦ ἐστι πρὸς κέντρα λακτείζειν.

\textsuperscript{100} SpadaRo, Raccomandazioni, ch. 3, 133.5-11: δίκαιος γὰρ ὁν, ἄδικον ἢ αἰσχρὸν οὐ φέρεις βλέπειν πραττόμενον, νυσσόμενος δὲ ἐπὶ τῆς ἀγαθῆς ταύτης ἀρετῆς, ὀργίζῃ μετὰ δίκαιον θημοῦ καὶ ἁμαρτάνοντας. ποιῆσας δὲ τοῦτο εἰς πάντας τοῖς ἁμαρτάνοντας ἠχθρανας αὐτοὺς καὶ τοὺς ὁμόφρονας αὐτῶν καὶ μελετήσαντες κατὰ σοῦ ἐπανέστησάν σοι.

BYZANTINA ΣΥΜΜΕΙΚΤΑ 26 (2016), 309-372
marked in the sources for his dynasty. A long digression interpolated in the Novel of the emperor Basil II of 996 and dated to the 11th century reveals how the civil wars under that emperor were explained by the Byzantines themselves several years later. According to the text, the Phocas family “possessed dynasty without interruption for generations” (ἀδιάδοχον... εἶχον τὴν δυναστείαν). But a letter of that same emperor, written probably in late summer or early autumn 987 and preserved by Michael Psellus at the end of his Chronography is astonishingly revealing in that respect. Its content relates not only to the enhancement of influence that comes with service, but also to its management by the imperial circles, to the expectations attached to it, and to the imperial assertion of absolute power and supremacy facing dynastic sway and status. The epistle was addressed to Bardas Phokas immediately after news of his revolution had reached Constantinople, and probably keeps some of the personal style of Emperor Basil II; it appeals to emotion, yet its tone is authoritative, aggressive and arrogant.

The first part of the letter is summarized by Psellus himself, who qualified the privileges granted to Phokas after his return from exile as “satrapical benefactions” (σατραπικὰς ὡς εἰπεῖν εὐεργεσίας), and suggested that the emperor had awarded him with a fortune befitting his office. Then Psellus’ narrative turns to direct speech as it copies the epistle: the emperor points out to Bardas Phokas that he had been “friend and ears and eyes of the king”,

102. SVRONOS, Novelles, 14.II.38-45. The Maleinoi are also mentioned with the Phocas.
103. The epistle is contained in Psellus, Chronographia II, 384-390. See D. REINSCH, Theophylaktos Simokattes in der Kanzlei Kaiser Basileios II. Zur γραφὴ τοῦ βασιλέως πρὸς τὸν Φωκᾶν am Ende der Chronographia des Michael Psellus, JÖB 58 (2008), 147-152. The authenticity of the epistle has been questioned, but REINSCH believes that it is authentic and contains the style of Basil II and his secretariat. Based on the details of the first part of the epistle, there can be absolutely no doubt that it is dated to the summer of 987.
104. Psellus, Chronographia II, 386.5-13. Phocas had been tonsured, a fact that is conveniently not mentioned in the epistle and is indicative of the distrust of the government towards him. The properties of Bardas Phokas and his father Leon were probably confiscated in 970/1; Bardas’ reinstatement in 978 probably meant that their wealth was returned to them, and maybe to some extend increased, as Psellus suggests here.
as he was placed in the hierarchy (τάξιν) higher than anybody else. These, said Basil, resulted in the expansion of his dynasty: “from these you became celebrated and your dynasty enlarged” (ἐξ ὧν σὺ καὶ ἤκουες τοσοῦτον καὶ ή δυναστεία ἡὔξηται). But the emperor vigorously underlines his own part: “who is now he, who dismisses and appoints men to the supreme offices?” (Τίς δὲ ὁ παύων νῦν καὶ καθιστῶν τὰς μεγίστας ἀρχὰς). The emperor also reminds Phokas that he had been generous to his father, his brother and other relatives for his sake (σὴν χάριν, σοῦ δὴ ἐνέκα πάντων ἀνεχόμενος), and that a number of people also benefitted from his rise to power, as they were appointed to military and civil posts, even though they were “not distinguished for their ancestors” (ἐξ ἀπορίας προγονικῆς); from their position they were able to come to the acquisition of immense wealth, by also “committing injustices, secretly and openly” (ἀδικούντων λάθρᾳ τε καὶ προδήλως). Basil II noted that he kept silent, and that none of them was charged, in the hope that Phokas’ alliance would affect the pacification of the unrest. Cheynet has noted that it is very difficult to estimate the number of Phokas’ relatives and supporters who entered or re-entered imperial service in 978, but it is clear that it finally brought a turn in favor of the emperor in the war against Skleros. The emperor’s allegations about the ancestral obscurity of his relatives may seem an exaggeration, and might even have sounded offensive to Phokas. But the epistle emphasizes both their previous absence of status and ties with the central administration (ἐξ ἰδιωτικῆς ταπεινότητος –from the humility of private life), and their sudden elevation to higher authority (εἰς ὕψος ἀξιωμάτων –to the heights of offices). It is quite plausible that here not only relatives who belonged to noble lineages are meant, but also others from the wider social influence circles of the Phokas family. The last part of the epistle reveals rather emphatically that it was expected of Phokas to use these people for supporting the imperial claims to power. Here we should understand that not only those who held military command are meant, but also those who would be in a position to diffuse imperial power within the provinces from an administrative post. It was certainly not part of Basil’s plans to have these people turn against him.

106. Psellos, Chronographia II, 386.18-19.
108. Psellos, Chronographia II, 386.20-388.33.
109. The time frame suggested is confined between the years 978 and 987. At that time, we find Leon Melissenos and Diogenes Adralestos, relatives of Bardas Phokas, having high commands in the army. Concerning the supporters of Phokas, it is interesting to compare the list of Skleros’ supporting and opposition members in 976-978 and 987, see Cheynet, Pouvoir, 27-29, 31-32, 330; Idem, Les Phocas, 494, 495.

The case of Bardas Phokas demonstrates the reciprocity in the relations of the government with the dynasts of the East; much as they were feared, they were also exploited for specific purposes, and this was to the full knowledge of both. Service undoubtedly multiplied the exercise of real social influence, but it would be oversimplifying to sustain that dynastic influence depended solely on, or grew exclusively from, service and income from the rewards of the imperial treasury. Authority on a local level is not advocated solely by the representatives of the king; exercising authority on a local level is a de facto privilege of those who, in a medieval context, stand out in the place where they live for any reason, be it wealth, descent, valor against the enemy, or philanthropy. The people of the country recognize in them their protector.

110. Note how Digenis Akritis refuses to receive anything from the emperor, but still places himself at his disposal and promises to fight the enemy: “I, quite worthless as I am, grant to your Highness that the tribute you once paid to Ikonion will, against their will, come to you in equivalent amounts, and I shall free you from this care, emperor”. The emperor, content with Digenis’ attitude, bestows on him the title of πατρίκιος and grants him an estate and many valuables. See Digenis Akritis. The Grottaferrata and Escorial Versions, ed. E. Jeffreys [Cambridge Medieval Classics 7], Cambridge 1998, 128.1028-1053 (hereafter Digenis Akritis).

112. Cheynet, Aristocratie, 318, 320; idem, Le rôle de l’aristocratie locale dans l’etat...
from raiding enemies, their mediator with the central authorities, those who will help in their hour of need, as Philaretos did with the peasants of his village. This type of authority exists in parallel with imperial authority. It does not owe its subsistence to Constantinople; it is recognized and respected by the locals and depends on, and is nourished by, reciprocity among those partaking in it as its agents or as its supporters. The texts examined above suggest that a delicate equilibrium of interests, pursuits and targets of its members was of equal importance. Its maintenance was a difficult task, and explains much of the fluidity of alliances observed in the 9th and especially in the 10th century. In turn, this conclusion says a lot about the liberty of individuals to decide freely and in favor of their own interests on whom they would give their allegiance to, and about the significance of this liberty, but this is a subject that will not be discussed here.

IV. The poor, the wealthy, and the noble

The testimonies clearly attribute to dynasts the type of illegal exercise of authority that the tenth century Novels on land ownership attack. The governments of the 10th century consciously targeted the expansion of social and political power resulting from the economic growth of leading figures in the provinces. The large mass of people of the lower social strata, which 10th-century legislation calls “the poor” (πένητες), is a group already promoted to the center of imperial propaganda in the 8th century with the prooimion of the Ecloga. In the 10th century they were juxtaposed with “the powerful”. But “the poor” remain, in spite of all the efforts, a group largely undefined; it was so in Byzantium as well. “The poor” are not that category

113. For an overview of patronage-clientele relations see Cheynet, Βυζαντινὸς χώρος, 303-307; par excellence H.-G. Beck, Byzantinische Gefolgschaftswesen, Bayerische Akademie der Wissenschaften, Philologisch-Historische Klasse, Sitzungsberichte (1965) 3-32 (: Idem, Ideen und Realitäten, no XI; hereafter Beck, Gefolgschaftswesen); also see Kaplan, Les hommes et la terre, 365-367. The problem of private retinues in Byzantium is an aspect that partly overlaps that of relations between patron and client. None have been thoroughly investigated so far, therefore I am not convinced that studying these two issues together is the right research approach.

BYZANTINA ΣΥΜΜΕΙΚΤΑ 26 (2016), 309-372
of people towards whom philanthropy aims—they are not the “useless” (ἄχρηστοι), not the sick, not the aged, who are normally easily detectable in the sources, either because of the terminology used, or because of the description; rather, the poor are those who are able to survive on their own.

The general definition of the 2nd century included in the Digesta reflects the total worth of assets below which somebody was considered “poor”; it is duly included in Greek in the Basilica without further specification. The chapter in which this definition is found relates to those who are excluded from bringing a lawsuit to court. Byzantine legislation did not introduce any improvement regarding this point. However, unlike what has been sustained so far, there is no explicit prohibition against “the poor” to testify at court before the 9th century. The exclusion from the judicial process of the most susceptible to intimidation and bribery is not found in the Basilica, but, rather surprisingly, in the Eisagoge of Patriarch Photios. There it is stated that “the poor do not testify” (οἱ πένητες οὐ μαρτυροῦσιν). Title 12.1 and 12.2 of the Eisagoge summarize from the Digesta 22.5.2 and 22.5.3, as well as from Justinian’s Novel 90, analyzed above. The stipulations are repeated in the Procheiros Nomos, a compilation dated to 907 or shortly after. The reason for prohibiting the poor from testifying at court is already found in the Digesta 22.5.3, and it is repeated both in the Eisagoge and the Procheiros Nomos: it should be examined whether the witness is “rich or poor, lest he may readily swear falsely for the purpose of gain” (εὔπορος ἢ ἐνδεής, ὥστε διὰ κέρδος τι πλημμελήσαι). The middle-Byzantine version of Justinian’s laws completely omits the term condicio, apparently because by the early 10th century any such distinction had become obsolete; it does, however, maintain the distinction between witnesses, honest-dishonest, rich or poor (τίμιος καὶ ἄμεμπτος ἢ ἄτιμος καὶ ἐπίψογος, εὔπορος ἢ ἐνδεής)\(^{119}\).

114. R. Morris, The Powerful and the Poor in Tenth-Century Byzantium: Law and Reality, Past and Present 73 (1976), 17-22 (hereafter Morris, The powerful and the poor); Kaplan, Les hommes et la terre, 368-371; Patlagean, Ελληνικός μεσαιωνας, 272; Patlagean, Pauvreté, 17-35; Brown, Poverty, 15. The image of the poor has been well sketched in the works of the Cappadocian Fathers, and Byzantine authors often reproduce these patterns. See Holman, The hungry; Eadem, Constructed and Consumed: the Everyday Life of the Poor in 4th c. Cappadocia, in: LAA 3.1, 441-461; W. Mayer, Poverty and Society in the World of John Chrysostom, ibid., 465-482.

115. Digesta, 48.2.10: nonuli propter paupertatem, ut sunt qui minus quam quinquaginta aureos habent. Cf. Basilicorum Libri LX, ed. H. Scheltema – N. Van der Wal, Groningen – Djakarta – The Hague 1955, 60.34.10 (hereafter Basilica) and see Kazhdan-Ronchey, Aristocrazia, 67-68; Patlagean, Pauvreté, 16, 380; Krumpholz, Aspekte, 28; and Brown, Poverty, 8-14, on the “construct of the Fathers”, i.e. the image of the poor in the sources.

Photios, who in all probability is responsible for introducing this novelty in the late 9th century, has already appeared in this treatise. The influence his beliefs had on the spirit of the law has not been adequately studied so far. The patriarch explicitly states in the introduction of the Eisagoge that “equality of the law” (ἰσότητι νόμου) is for God a fundamental constituent of “order” (κόσμος), which is thus made “with harmony” (ἁρμονικῶς)\(^{120}\).

See Patlagean, Pauvreté, 17 and n. 30; Eadem, La pauvreté à Byzance, 66-67. Based on the Procheiros nomos, Patlagean expressed the opinion that the stipulation depended on the Digesta, apparently because it was thought that the Procheiros Nomos preceded the Basilica; she therefore confused the chapter de accusationibus found in the Digesta with περὶ μαρτύρων found both in the Eisagoge and the Procheiros Nomos. But recently the Procheiros Nomos has been re-dated to the reign of Leon VI, and specifically to 907. This means that the text repeats the stipulation of Photios, which is not found in the Basilica (because it is not found in the Digesta either). On the Procheiros Nomos see the analysis of A. Schminck, Studien zu mittelbyzantinischen Rechtsbüchern [Forschungen zur byzantinischen Rechtsgeschichte 13], Frankfurt a. M. 1986, 62 f. (hereafter Schminck, Studien); Troianos, Πηγές, 246-249 with further bibliography. The prohibitions against individuals to bring an action at court has been examined by Riinger, Humiliores-honestiores, 101 f., esp. 110-112, 127-136, who did not comment on the criterion of poverty apart from noting that it is a general provision within a set of general principles.

119. Epanagoge, 12.2, 262; Procheiros nomos, 27.8, 178-179. The law of the Digesta distinguished the condicio between decurions and plebeians, see above note 53.

120. Schminck, Studien, 8.66-71: ἃτιμος δὲν εἶ ἄρχητε πᾶντα γὰρ αὐτοῦ ἑπεξεργάζομαι, ἠνάρμονας ἐν κόσμῳ ἡμῶν, ἐπάνω· ἐνάρμονας ἡμῶν, ἁρμονικῶς συναθροίζεται (Epanagoge, 238). See commentary in J. Scharf, Quellenstudien zum Prooimion der Epanagoge, BZ 52 (1959), 68-81, here 74-77. The text at this point is strongly influenced by Artistotle and Plato. Also see the analysis of J. Lokin, The significance of Law and Legislation in the the Law Books of
The idea of “equality of the law”, then, is dominant in the Eisagoge. In Title 12, specifically, it is clear that the legislator aimed at protecting the judicial process from possible corruption, and not at establishing a social distinction between the poor and the wealthy. The laws on witnesses in Byzantium prove that contesting the competence of a person to appear before a court of law either as an accuser, litigant or as a simple witness by accusing them of being poor (πένης), infamis (ἄτιμος), or unknown (ἄγνωστος), was above all a legal argument produced by that party that pursued delaying tactics or had some other vested interest in the case. It is possible to decipher how this general principle worked in reality by combining our information about the rich with evidence on the poor.

We have seen that the role of wealth in the perception of social position distinctions is insignificant. Thus it is defined already in the Digesta that “he is considered solvent who has sufficient property to satisfy any claim which may be brought against him by a creditor”. The stipulation is, as expected, repeated in the Basilica121. In the Ecloga Basilicorum, a collection of scholia dated to the 12th century (probably 1142), we find an elucidating comment on the significance of financial position. According to the commentator, “the poor who own no landed property should stand trial when they are given a guarantor” (τοὺς δὲ πένητας καὶ μὴ ἀκίνητον ἔχοντας κτήσιν μετὰ δόσεως ἐγγυητοῦ δικάζεσθαι). The judge, however, should examine if the defendant owned sufficient property to reimburse the plaintiff, in which case he should “consider him wealthy and not ask of him to produce a guarantor” (πλούσιον τοῦτον εἰπὲ)122. The example given by the commentator appears to expand on stipulations of the Digesta and Basilica, which grant to the judge freedom of decision and to the litigants latitude for defending their own case. In this context, it appears that the possession of landed property is normally not connected with perceptions of poverty123, and that poor people

---

121. Digesta, 50.16.234.1; Basilica, 2.2.225.
123. The tenth century novels on landownership also do not connect poverty with the possession of land; the stipulation of Hermogenes is included in them in order to clarify who is considered poor. See Svoronas, Novelles, no 4.47-50.
had the option of taking a guarantor to appear at court. Therefore, wealth and poverty are debatable in a legal context and the limit for crossing from the first to the second condition is not fixed, but rather adjusts to the actual circumstances of the trial, even if, in a real social context, neither situation can be concealed. The ambiguity of these conceptions explains very well why so many laws of the 10th century focused on the πένητες (the poor) and the δυνατοί (the powerful). While the exercise of power against the economically, politically and, in the end, socially weak was easily perceived, the absence of real distinctions among the “classes” produced the effect that social position was not consolidated for the dominant groups, which remained thus open to potential attack, and that to the people at the other end of the social ladder some space was given for claiming their own rights.

The long epistle no 187 of Patriarch Photios is elucidating when it comes to the poor in relation to the wealthy. Photios answers to a question of the πρωτοσπαθάριος and πρωτασηκρῆτις Christophoros concerning the alienation of landed property with the purpose of withdrawing from the world (meaning, to be tonsured a monk). Christophoros had asked “which house can maintain its honor” (ποῖος οἶκος ἔντιμος εἶναι δύναται;) if

124. Digesta, 2.8.2., 2.8.2.1; Basilica, 7.14.2: Ἐπὶ τῆς παραστάσεως εὔπορος νοεῖται ἐγγυητὴς οὐ μόνον ἐκ τῆς οὐσίας, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐκ τῆς εὐχερείας τοῦ ἐνάγεσθαι. Αναγέρως δίδοται ἐγγυητὴς τοῖς μὴ δυναμένοις ἐνάγειν. It is not clear whether the provision of providing a guarantor applied also in case of prosecutions of the poor, since there is an explicit prohibition regarding this point. The Basilica, following the Digesta, are full of stipulations concerning guarantors, as in the example given here, but none of them –to my knowledge– refers specifically to bringing actions. Digesta, 2.8 specifies that “to give security has reference to our adversary when he provides for what is desired by us”; in simpler words we might say that the prosecutor does not appear at court to be judged, therefore he needn’t prove that he is solvent, because no reimbursement will be asked of him. On the contrary, the accused needs to prove that he owns sufficient property, but he might as well contest the liability of his opponent to appear before the court; in case his claim was accepted by the judge, the argument would annul the trial altogether. Also see above, n. 59. Basilica, 7.14.1 translate the terms satisfacere/satisdare very loosely in τὸ ἱκανὸν-τὸ ἀσφαλές.

125. This is also displayed in the instance recalled by the commentator, according to whom the defendant claimed κἂν πένης εἰμὶ ὅσον πρὸς τοὺς πολλὰ κεκτημένους, ἀλλὰ γε ἐπὶ τῇ παρούσῃ ὑποθέσει πλούσιος λογίζομαι καὶ εἰμί (even if I am poor in comparison to those with many assets, I am still considered, and I am, rich regarding the present case). See Ecloga Basilicorum, 77.3-5.
everything is sold\(^{126}\). Photios with indignation compared Christophoros to the emperor Julian, who allegedly posed the problem “how, if everything is sold, is an honourable house capable of doing anything?” (πόσ γὰρ πραθέντον ἀπάντων οἶκος ἐντιμὸς δύναται τι ἢ οἰκία;)\(^{127}\). The emperor Julian was supposedly referring to the ancient idea about the support the rich (in the question specifically the οἶκος ἐντιμὸς) were able to offer to their dependants; the wealth of the well-off was distributed to the people depending on the houses\(^{128}\). Christophoros, however, reversed the main idea by pointing out that possession of wealth is essential for the preservation of honour, implying that its alienation leads to irreparable loss of nobility\(^{129}\). The argument effected the long answer of Patriarch Photios, whose literary \(^{126}\) Photios, Epistulae II, no 187.84, 248.

\(^{127}\) Photios, Epistulae II, no 187.11. In reality Photius is drawing his material from works of Theodore of Mopsuestia against the emperor Julian, see A. Guida, Replica a Giuliano Imperatore: adversus criminationes in Christianos Juliani imperatoris [Biblioteca Patristica 24], Firenze 1994, no 6. The quotation of Theodore of Mopsuestia appears to depend on Clement of Alexandria, τίς γὰρ ἂν κοινωνία καταλείποιτο παρὰ ἀνθρώπως, εἰ μηδεὶς ἔχω μηδὲν... πῶς ἄν τις πεινῶντα καὶ διψῶντα ποτίζει καὶ γυμνὸν σκεπάζει καὶ ἄστεγον συνάγει... εἰ πάντων αὐτὸς ἐκατοσ τοῦτον ἐστερεόν; See L. Fruchtel – O. Stahl – U. Treu (eds), Clemens Alexandrinus, v. 3 [Die Griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller 17] Berlin 1970, ch. 13.1. Unfortunately, there is no telling which of the two texts Christophorus read that would have incited him to write to Photius the letter that infuriated the patriarch so much. H.-G. Beck, Kirche und theologische Literatur im byzantinischen Reich, München 1959, 527, thought that Photios had written a polemic essay against the emperor Julian. Also see A. Kazhdan, A History of Byzantine Literature (850-1000), ed. Chr. Angelidi [NHRF/IBR Research Series 4], Athens 2006, 16, who thought that Photios in epistle 187 questions the “principle of the divine origin of political power”.

\(^{128}\) The οἶκοι have been defined as holding a highly important social role in Byzantium as nuclei of social, economical and political life. See P. Magdalino, The Byzantine Aristocratic Oikos, in: The Byzantine aristocracy, 92-111; Idem, Honour, 185, 193-194, 196-200, 213; L. Neville, Authority in Byzantine Provincial Society, 950-1100, Cambridge 2004, 66-68.

\(^{129}\) The difference is very subtle but perceivable because of the syntax: ἐντιμὸς in the text of “Julian” is an epithet of οἶκος, which means that honour is an inherent quality of οἶκος, and because of their nobility noble houses diffuse their wealth to the people, in other words, nobility exists in a house and philanthropy springs from it. In Christophoros’ question, ἐντιμὸς is predicative to οἶκος, which means that it is acquired, not inherent; in this case it is the existence of wealth that leads to nobility, because with wealth the houses may proceed to donations and thus prove their nobility, in other words, wealth equals nobility.
inspiration was not enough to conceal his fury. The patriarch’s arguments often contradict each other; the terminology and models used are Roman (e.g. ἔντιμος-honestior, κτήτορες-possessores). Still, the epistle, on the whole, is an excellent example of rhetoric, as the patriarch strives to answer the problem from all possible viewpoints. Photios devoted many lines to prove to Christophoros that the virtue of abstaining from one’s own possessions but also “from the possessions of neighbours” (τοῖς πλησίον ἐξιστάμενος τῆς ἰδίας ὠφελείας) carries more virtues of the same sort and contributes to personal accomplishment; on the contrary, to follow Julian’s advice, which makes “the hands of his citizens collect their fortune with the labour of others”, leads to avarice, deceit, and cruelty. Photios asks Christophoros “are avarice and tyranny honorable to you?” (ἀλλ’ ἡ πλεονεξία, ἡ τυραννίς σοι τὰ ἔντιμα;) to declare that “the possessores were selling, not everybody, not the penetes” (ὅσοι κτήτορες, οὗτοι ἐπώλουν, οὐχὶ ἄπαντες, οὐδ’ οἱ πένητες). It clearly appears that two fundamental ideas are colliding in the epistle: Christophoros appears to make of wealth an essential characteristic of nobility; it is that element, through which nobility is socially recognized, therefore insufficiency of means alienates nobility from the source of its projection and manifestation to society. Even though Christophoros’ argument appears to be an ingenious sophistry, we might recognize in it the grasp of the upper social strata at their resources; in this concept, wealth is inseparable from nobility and nobility becomes the cause of wealth, in other words, a nobleman must be rich, and, consequently, he must safeguard his assets from alienation. It is to this idea that Photios reacted so strongly. The patriarch implies that the πένητες need their own piece of land to make a living, therefore rich neighbors should not seek to buy out their properties. Photios characterizes the one who buys the land of the poor as “lover of profit and riches” (φιλοκερδῆ καὶ φιλόπλουτον) and in the end wonders “is everybody rich and nobody is poor, is there nobody living only on one’s own possessions?" (πάντες πλούσιοι καὶ πένης οὐδείς, οὐδεὶς δὲ οὐδὲ τῶν ἐν αὐτάρκεια μόνη βιούντων;)134. This idea is not at all new; sufficing to one's own possessions had already been a desideratum of St. Basil in connection with avarice. But αὐτάρκεια in this context concerns the rich, not the poor135; it does not relate to subsistence means after the Platonic model, but to the exploitation of resources of wealth. In the epistle of Photios, however, the concept is applied both to the wealthy and to the poor: their assets should be enough for them in order not to need to buy or sell land. The argument appears to be in favor of the poor; with his ideas Photios underlines the right of the poor to maintain an autonomous existence and to keep their property against the expansionist policies of their neighbors.

If wealth is essential for the social projection of nobility, nobility itself is a rather elusive notion136. In a number of hagiographical texts, it appears

134. Photios, Epistulae II, no 187.225-227. I prefer the translation “living on one’s own possessions” for ἐν αὐτάρκεια μόνη βιούντων because I think it transfers the meaning better than “living on self-sufficiency” in the context described here.

136. MAGDALINO, Court society, 218-219, contemplates on the most appropriate term to use for describing the upper social strata of Byzantium, to conclude that the term ‘aristocracy’ “is certainly less inappropriate than ‘nobility’”. I tend to disagree with this opinion; literally ἄριστοκρατία means “the rule of the ἄριστοι” and refers to an ideal philosophical desideratum, since the notion of ἄριστοι includes moral qualities, therefore the term ἄριστοκρατία is of political content and refers to the polity, πολιτεία, or πολίτευμα. The Byzantines were familiar with the content of the term, as was Attaleiates, Magdalino’s example. In my appreciation, its significance is apparently the reason why it is generally not used in Byzantine sources, as opposed to the term ἄριστοι, which describes a particular group of people that possess specific qualities, but I reserve my judgement until a closer examination of the subject. Here I prefer the term “nobility”, because it refers to the most important characteristic that the Byzantine upper class claimed, meaning descent from an ancient, notable family. The corresponding terms, often found in the sources, are εὖ γεγονότες, εὐγενεῖς, εὐγένεια. Nevertheless, I have already used the term “aristocracy” in this study more schematically. On the term aristocracy see I. ANTONOPOLOU, La question de l’aristocratie Byzantine. Remarques sur l’ambivalence du terme “aristocratie” dans la recherche historique contemporaine, ΣΥΜΜΕΙΚΤΑ 15 (2002), 257-264; EADEM, The issue of “Aristocracy” in Byzantium. A Novel Approach, in: Antecessor. Festschrift für Sp. Troianos

BYZANTINA SYMMEIKTA 26 (2016), 309-372

http://epublishing.ekt.gr | e-Publisher: EKT | Downloaded at 05/03/2021 02:14:44 |
to be founded on indigenous descent of generations. The model is ancient Greek; the rare term εὐπατρίδαι for nobility is bound to the rights and privileges of citizenship, which normally include the possession of land, but not necessarily the possession of riches. Thus in the Life of George of Amastris it is stated that his parents were “locals and notables” (εὐπάτριδες καὶ ἐπίσημοι); they were known “not for their immense wealth, not for their famous dynasty”, but for their piety. In the Miracles of St. Nicholas, it is explained regarding an eupatrides that “he was reduced to absolute poverty and because of this he appeared to have lost his nobility” (εἰς ἐσχάτην πενίαν ἔλάσαντος καὶ ταύτη τὸ εὐγενὲς ἀπολωλεκέναι δόξαν). The concept of citizenship is specifically mentioned in the case of St. Nikephoros of Medikion, who was “an indigenous citizen of the all blessed Constantinople” (τῆς πανευδαίμονος Κωνσταντινουπόλεως αὐτόχθων πολίτης). The Life of Euthymios the Younger, who is recognized as coming from “noble parents” (γεννήτορες εὐπατρίδες), underlines the possession of the family’s landed property through their obligation to pay the taxes. As in the case of dynasty, it may be concluded that nobility is recognized locally by the social environment of the nobles. But the majority of texts emphasize on state service and dependence, which enhances the nobility of the family and contributes to the prosperity of the relatives. Kallistos, for example, one of the martyrs of Amorion, is said to have enlisted in the imperial service “for the prosperity of the relatives” (διὰ τὴν συγγενῶν ευδοκίμησιν)142, and Patriarch Tarasios came from “patricians from a line of patricians” (ἐκ πατρικίων σειρᾶς πατρίδιοι)143. For the second half of the 11th century, the writers use the ancient term ἐυπατρίδαι to describe certain persons: those surrounding Isaakios I Comnenos in 1057144, Romanos IV Diogenes145, Nikephoros III Botaneiates146, and, as expected, Alexios I Komnenos147. However, the use of the word in these instances betrays the classicizing trend of the time, since it is deprived of its ancient context.

---

140. F. Halkin, La Vie de Saint Nicéphore fondateur de Médikion en Bithynie (+813), AnBoll 78 (1960), 396-430, here 405, ch. 5.8-13.

Emphasis on wealth in this framework often serves the narrative as the negative model from which the hero disassociates himself in order to reach sanctity; it is indeed a first proof of purity of soul and holiness. The texts that elaborate on the riches of the families are quite known: the Life of Philaretos the Merciful, the Life of Theophanes the Confessor and the Life of Michael Maleinos. Enumerating the sources of wealth, size of the land owned, number of flocks etc., appears to be an Aristotelian model148, which,

142. V. Vasilevski – P. Nikitin, Skazanija o 42 amorijskich mucenikach, St. Petersburg 1905, 23 (cited after the Hagiography Database of Dumbarton Oaks; hereafter Life of Forty-two martyrs of Amorion).
146. Ioannis Zonarac Epitomae Historiarum Libri XIII-XVIII, ed. T. Büttner-Wobst [CSHB], v. 3, Bonn 1897, 715.10 (hereafter Zonaras 3).
147. E. Tsolakes, Η Συνέχεια της Χρονογραφίας του Ιωάννου Σκυλίτση (Ioannes Skylitzes Continuatus) [Etauwía Makedonínikon Σκοπούσον, Ίδυμα Μαλετών Χερσονήσου του Αίμου 105], Thessalonike 1968, 180.9-10.
in Byzantium, is set within a Christian frame. It is quite characteristic that, while the author of the Life of Philaretos models the description of wealth on the Book of Job, thus profiling in reality a stock farmer, he adds the possession of forty-eight προάστεια of good land by his hero; the implication is that Philaretos was not just a stock-breeding farmer, but also a local archon, an εὐγενὴς (a nobleman), according to the text, with family roots of many generations in Paphlagonia. In the Life of Theophanes, the hero of the story disregarded the ideals of an aristocratic living altogether, fortune (πλοῦτος παφλάζων – splashing riches), physical appearance, life style, but in the Life of Michael Maleinos family riches are inseparable from the notion of nobility and state service and they complete the noble profile of the Maleinoi. The possession of land is used to add to the nobility of a person. We find it in many saints’ lives; in a different source, the historical

150. V. V. LATYSHEV, Meofodiya patriarcha Konstantinopol’skogo Žitie prep. Feofana Isposedniki, Petersburg 1918, 4 ch. 6 (cited after the Hagiography Database of Dumbarton Oaks; hereafter Life of Theophanes). The model of physical beauty, apart from the unique description in the Life of Theophanes, is also found in the Life of Forty-two martyrs of Amorion, 24-25, and in Digenis Akritos, 4.30-38, 78.196-199, 106.688-690 and elsewhere in the epic. So far the best commentary on the significance of physical appearance for the aristocracy is found in SARADI, as above n. 43, 57-61, but it concerns only the early Byzantine period. Also see the recent work of M. HATZAKI, Experiencing physical beauty in Byzantium: the body and the ideal, in: Experiencing Byzantium, ed. C. NESBITT – M. JACKSON [Society for the Promotion of Byzantine Studies Publications 18], Farnham-Burlington 2013, 233-250, on the ideal of beauty in the 11th-12th c.

152. In the Life of St. Philaretos, 60.3, 26 (commentary), land possession is enhanced with an exquisite wordplay: νῦς ἑφάρχον Γεωργίου τοῦ Γεωργίου – γεωργίου, γεωργία are both contextualized in the name Georgios, which appears thus to be an aristocratic name, and Life of Basil, the benefaction of Danelis explains a decisive stage in the ennoblement and social elevation of Basil, that of becoming a landowner, of becoming rich (καὶ γέγονε πλούσιος καὶ αὐτός), a development that allowed Basil to buy land and to aid his own people\(^{153}\).

From what we have seen so far it becomes clear that we are dealing with two separate profiles for the possession of wealth: the first is connected with avarice and dynasty, whereby it refers to phenomena targeted in the legislation; the second is attached to nobility as its necessary component. The state did not generally disregard nobility or wealth, but, as we have seen above, attributed more significance to service. The emperor Leon VI, in an abstract much discussed of his Taktika\(^{154}\), binds nobility to active service in a manner that is immediately recognizable in the 9th-10th century through the use of its terminology, even if the abstract deviates only slightly from the Strategicus of Onasander\(^{155}\). Almost all the terms come from the ancient text: descent from a celebrated family “should be admired” (ἀγαπᾶν μὲν δεὶ τοῦτο); it gives someone fame (λαμπρύνεται), solemnity (σεμνύνεσθαι, in the sense of receiving office or title) and glory (δοξάζομενοι)\(^{156}\). The harmonic combination of glorious ancestry and valor is proof of εὐτυχία, good fortune, meaning the concentration of admirable merits in one person. The included crosswise scheme develops the ancient text with specific Byzantine connotations: λιτοί in Byzantium – a term inserted by the Byzantine author – were those who offered their services without any further distinction, such as simple soldiers; according to Leon, they will be rewarded for their deeds, but someone who is only known for his descent will remain ἄπρακτος, meaning without function or any other distinction, if he does not possess the virtues needed to serve 157. Leon VI allowed the characterization ἄχρηστοι (useless) of Onasander for the generals who show no virtue, and ἀριστεία (excellence) for the performance of simple soldiers. With this the emperor equates noblemen without virtues to that category of people who offer nothing to the polity, while on the other hand ascribes a moral quality par excellence of the aristocracy to simple soldiers with the purpose to highlight their bravery 158. A totally original single phrase betrays the emperor’s thoughts about nobility: “this is how we should evaluate the nobility of men, not from descent from [a noble] lineage, but from their own deeds and accomplishments” (οὕτω χρὴ σκοπεῖν καὶ τὴν τῶν ἀνθρώπων εὐγένειαν, οὐκ ἀπὸ τῶν προγόνων, ἀλλ’ ἀπὸ τῶν ιδίων πράξεων καὶ κατορθωμάτων) 159.

\(^{154}\)The Tactica of Leo the VI, ed. G. DENNIS [CFHB 49], Washington, DC, 2010, 22.77-26.116 (hereafter Leonis Tactica).

\(^{156}\)Leonis Tactica, 24.93-94, 102-106.

Thus, for the emperor, valor only proves, and is worthy of, nobility. Nobility may very well exist outside the circles of those under στρατεία, and noblemen could indeed be private individuals, ἰδιῶται. In this case

157. Οἰκονομίδης, Λίστερ, 290. The term used in the Taktikon of Philotheos is ἄπρακτος. Λιτός means “simple”. It is noteworthy that the author of Leonis Tactica completes the scheme of the ancient model, which contains only the first term, by inserting the term λιτὸς to emphasize the contrast.

158. Leonis Tactica, 24.93-104.

159. Leonis Tactica, 24.97-98. My translation differs from that of Dennis. This phrase is original, not a copy of the ancient text; Ὀνάσανδρος, Στρατηγικός, ch. I.22, framed the merits of the generals in the democratic environment of the ancient cities. Haldon, Commentary, 132, believes that Leon VI attributed importance to descent even if the text is “ambiguous”. Cf. Idem, Social elites, 181, where there is some distance from this view. Also see Ostrogorsky, Aristocracy, 4-5; Magdalino, Court society, 230; Kazhdan – McCormick, Byzantine court, 172 (the authors consider the text as proof of “vertical mobility”); Cheynet, Aristocratie, 296-297; Kazhdan – Ronchev, Aristocrazia, 68-69; Vlyssidou, Αριστοκρατικές οικογένειες, 82-83.
nothing restricted its theoretical justification, its beliefs and the modes of its self-projection to society. But if it lay at the disposition of the emperor and came under the στρατεία obligation, the interest that its extraordinary accomplishments be used for the common good is explicit. Leon VI is also rather apologetic towards wealth: “we do not repudiate the rich person because he is rich” (οὐ μὴν οὖδὲ τὸν πλούσιον ἀποδοκιμάζομεν ὅτι πλούσιος), but a rich person should not be appointed to a high military command on account of his riches, but only on account of his merits. The originality of the emperor sharply contrasts with the conclusions of another writer of the 10th century, who also copied the text of Onasander, but reached the exact opposite decision by choosing decisively the wealthy over the “poor” general (πλούσιον μᾶλλον ἢ πένητα –rather the rich than the poor). This judgment on nobility, virtue and wealth, evokes similar views written by Photios in the Κεφάλαια παραινετικά in honor of Leon VI, allegedly on behalf of his father, Basil I. In this text the patriarch discredits nobility and wealth before virtue, and descent before friendship.

It is clear that the profiles that have been sketched so far do not coincide. The official views maintained about “aristocracy” in Byzantium demanded the delivering of active services to the emperor and the empire, while on the other hand rendered at least suspect the possession of wealth and the inclination of rich and noble families to increase their economic

---

160. Leonis Tactica, 22.77-80. Elsewhere the emperor calls πλούσιοι καὶ ἀνανδροι those who chose not to fight but rather preferred to buy out the obligation of their military service. See Leonis Tactica, 610.1059.

163. K. RAIDAS, Δύο παραινετικά κείμενα πρὸς τὸν αὐτοκράτορα Λέοντα ΣΤ’ τον Σοφό [Κείμενα Βυζαντινής Λογοτεχνίας 5], Athens 2009, ch. 8, 120: ἢ δὲ κτήμας τῆς ἀρετῆς, οἷς ἀν προσγένηται, καὶ πλούτου καὶ εὐγενείας χρησιμωτέρα ἐστί;...; ch. 12, 128: Χαίρε τοῖς σπουδάζουσι περί σὲ τὸν φίλον μᾶλλον ὡς ἀληθείαν ἢ τοῖς τῷ γένει προσφέρουσιν. ἢ μὲν γὰρ τῷ γένους φιλίαν ὡς ἄρετῆς, ἢ δὲ ἐν φύσεις περιγέγονον... The texts, however, have not been examined by the editor for their models, their provenance and their contextualization.
basis. At about the same time Leon VI produced the Taktika, another text confirms this approach. The Taktikon of Philotheos dates from 899, and his statement has been taken as proof that hierarchy in Byzantium was centered at the royal court. But Philotheos says more than that, as he proclaims that “nobility” (περιφάνεια βίου) in the sense of “celebrated honour of titles” (ἔνδοξος ἀξιωμάτων ἀξία) is perceptible and meaningful only when someone is invited to dine with the emperor. According to this proclamation, service and the duties attached to it attribute περιφάνεια, the nobility in life, to those who undertake them. The right to dine with the emperor was awarded, according to the Taktikon, to all those who served, from the highest dignitaries, to the people of the palace, down to the simple soldiers that were duly included in the list, who were also under obligation of στρατεία. Philotheos then, in reality stated that all nobility, all wealth that anybody might possess is of no importance to imperial power, unless it lies at its service.

One might wonder if these texts, when they reached the public, raised any questions or objections, especially from the families that were represented at the hierarchy of the palace. Reaction is very hard to trace, but we could perhaps deduce that the aristocracy in middle Byzantium was found in a position to have to assert its nobility in the frame of a state that did not officially recognize it and did not formally consolidate it under the law. The system, however, may have worked both ways: while attracting those who possessed the means to acquire real power, who were thus obliged to use their charismas, such as their good reputation, their training and wealth, for the benefit of the state, it was also a way for people of the upper social strata to enhance their nobility, if they already had it, to advertise their line of birth and to benefit from the generous rewards. No source is more characteristic for the declaration of nobility, founded on the services provided to the state, than the Life of Michael Maleinos. For families that were wealthy, but did not technically count for aristocratic, it was possible to acquire nobility. We learn for example that a κηρουλλάριος at the beginning of the 9th century gave up almost his entire fortune for the privilege of dining with the king.

164. OIKONOMIDÉS, Listes, 83.18-21.
the chronographer -no other than Theophanes the Confessor, of an old Constantinopolitan family-, συναρίστησόν μοι (dine with me), already anticipates the Taktikon of Philotheos almost a century earlier. It is not very clear what the objection of Theophanes was, and whether it concerned the large amount of money paid by the man in exchange for a title, or his humble origin, since he was simply a Constantinopolitan entrepreneur. But the event clearly indicates that the practice of title and/or function purchase by the wealthy businessmen of Constantinople was not confined only to the 11th century, even though it might have cost them more than the normal purchasing prices.

V. The state and the powerful

The government was, as we have seen, willing to turn a blind eye to the misdemeanors of the nobles, especially in the provinces, where imperial

166. Theophanis Chronographia vol. I, ed. C. De Boor, Lipsiae 1883, 487.29-488.6; Leonis Grammatici Chronographia, ed. I. Bekker [CSHB], Bonn 1842, 205.4-6; Zonaras 3, 307.9-308.2; See Yannopoulos, Société profane, 32. It is quite probable that this is the first member of the family of Keroullarioi, mostly known from the 11th c. According to the narrative, the purchase -probably of a higher title- cost the keroullarios ninety pounds of gold in the narrative of Zonaras, or more, in the version of Theophanes, who adds that the emperor ordered the keroullarios: ἄρον νομίσματα ρʹ, καὶ πορεύου ἀρκούμενος (take one hundred nomismata and leave, sufficing to it). The chronographers agree on the systematic policy pursued by Nikephoros I regarding the commercial classes of Constantinople, and allude either to the purchasing of a title (Zonaras), or to the roga of the keroullarios, which apparently amounted to 100 gold nomismata (Theophanes). The Chronicle of Theophanes Confessor. Byzantine and Near Eastern History, AD 284-813, ed. C. Mango – R. Scott with the assistance of G. Greatrex, Oxford 1997, 670, correct the text of Theophanes to 10 litres, but I am not sure that their suggestion can stand (if it refers to a roga, it would depend on the title bought). Also see PmBZ, ed. R.-J. Lilie et al., Bd. 5, Berlin – N. York 2001, no 11334; ODB 2, 1124-1125, s.v. Keroularios (A. Kazhdan). An epigram signalled by Kazhdan makes specific reference to the origins of the Keroullarioi: καὶ συ στρατηγός κηροπώλου παιδίον... κατείδι δαίμονα στρατηγέτην καὶ κηροπώλην... καὶ Χαβδᾶν αὐτὸν ἐν μέσῃ Βυζαντίδι... See Sr. Lampros, Τα ὑπ' ἀριθμὸν ΡΙΣ΄ καὶ ΡΓ΄ κατάλοιπα, NE 16 (1922) 30-59, here 45.13-19. While we do not have enough evidence to identify the Keroullarios of the poem, Χαβδᾶς is probably not the emir of Halep, but his cousin, the Arab poet Abu Firaz, who was captured during the fall of Aleppo to the Byzantines and was taken to Constantinople. This gives us a fairly accurate dating of the poem to around 962.

BYZANTINA SYMMEIKTA 26 (2016), 309-372
power was harder to reach. The contour was flexible and not very austere, provided that the nobles supported the emperor’s authority in the country. But in the 10th century the social influence of the nobles became a source of concern on occasion of an increase in small property alienation by the lower middle class landowners that followed the heavy winter of 927/8. To deal with this problem the government promulgated a series of Novels of unprecedented austerity and complexity for their social ramifications\(^{167}\). The traditionalist approach chosen by the legislator is rather disorienting\(^{168}\); indeed, the departing point of the legislation is the ancient Roman term \(δυνατοί, potentes\), and the phrasing of the texts, loaded with references to St. Basil and St. Chrysostom, obscures the real novelties included in them. But these laws in effect merged the profiles of the powerful and the dynasts into one by attributing to the first the qualities that normally belonged to the latter, meaning the exercise of real and often repressive power by the politically and socially distinguished. Moreover, the Novel of 934 confined this group to the representatives of the upper social strata and specifically to the so-called “nobility of service”\(^{169}\). As a consequence, this stratum in Byzantium was officially incriminated for its social influence, authority and wealth.

The Novels expose the networks of the powerful, which included not only relatives by blood or marriage, but also those belonging to their houses, the \(οἰκεῖοι\), –individuals with close ties with the families–, as well as people employed for carrying out their transactions\(^{170}\). They also explain the methods for expanding their resources and their access to manpower; these concerned direct exercise of authority, violence and deceit\(^{171}\), a series of legal contracts resulting in ownership alienation (such as donation, bequest, endowment and others)\(^{172}\), and known methods of social promotion such as

---

168. Svoronis, Novelles, no 3. For a definition of the \(δυνατοί\) see Ostrogorsky, Aristocracy, 6; Lemerle, Agrarian history, 95-96, 98; Morris, The powerful and the poor, 13-17; Kaplan, Les hommes et la terre, 363-363; Cheynet, Pouvoir, 249.
169. Svoronis, Novelles, no 3.50-58.
adoption and marriage\textsuperscript{173}. Due to the promise of προστασία (protection), συνδρομὴ (assistance) and εὐεργεσία (benefaction)\textsuperscript{174}, the persuasive methods of the “powerful” could be extremely successful. Social activity and influence that was, as we have seen, normal for dynasts such as Philaretos and Kekaumenos, was targeted, if not condemned, by the legislation of the 10th century. This gave the opportunity to litigants of different social provenance to question the motives and the sincerity of their opponents, to stigmatize them as “powerful” and to overturn decisions and annul contracts, independently of the truthfulness of their allegations. How successful this legislation was in the 10th century is demonstrated simply by the number of the Novels promulgated for this purpose, which dealt with specifications regarding the details of the transactions that had been taking place. The particular concern of the legislators to define the “powerful” in comparison to others in the same social context, e.g. in the village communities or in the army\textsuperscript{175}, is indicative, once again, of the absence of real social boundaries in \textsuperscript{173} SvoRonoS, Novelles, no 2.I.77-78. See E. Patlagean, Christianisation et parentés rituelles: le domaine de Byzance, in: Annales, Economies, Sociétés, Civilisations, 33 no 3 (1978), 625-636 [Eadem, Structure sociale, no XII]; R. Macrides, Kinship by Arrangement: the Case of Adoption, DOP 44 (1990) 109-118; R. Macrides, The Byzantine Godfather, BMGS 11 (1987), 139-162; C. Rapp, Ritual brotherhood in Byzantium, Traditio 52 (1997), 300-304. Adoption is specifically mentioned; marriage is implied with endowment. Συντεκνία, godparenthood, and ritual brotherhood are not mentioned in the law, but Macrides rightfully points out the similarity of terms concerning adoption and baptismal sponsorship. The author maintains that adoption was “non-social” since, unlike brotherhood, it was not used to build up social solidarities outside the family; she also acknowledges that it was used to absorb the land of the πένητες. Nevertheless, it should be emphasized that the context, in which all these methods and contracts are mentioned in the Novel of Romanos I, is of manifestly social character. Clearly then these transactions entailed benefit for the πένητες and created social solidarities; by enlarging the families with a view to social advancement, they actually bound poor people to the wealthy god-parents of their children. On these and related issues see recently C. Rapp, Brother-making in Late Antiquity and Byzantium. Monks, Laymen and Christian Ritual, New York 2016, esp. 9-21.

\textsuperscript{174} SvoRonoS, Novelles, no 2.I.79, 85.

\textsuperscript{175} SvoRonoS, Novelles, no 4.80-84, 5.25-26, 38-40, 102.
Byzantium. But in my opinion there can be no doubt that the legislation of the 10th century on landownership was detrimental to the financial interests of the “nobility of service”. The servants of the empire were found with their back against the wall, as they were indiscriminately branded with avarice, deceit and arrogance, a negative model that was thus formalized and was reproduced even in the 11th century.

With the reservation that legal sources transmit the official perception about the Byzantine “nobility of service” and do not reproduce the general public opinion about its members, we must admit that their profile is not at all flattering. The Novels relating to the protection of small and medium landowners have been mostly explained against the background of an increasing competition for the control of manpower and resources. In this context, the protection of the πένητες, the poor, is only a vehicle for checking the social influence of the “powerful”\textsuperscript{176}. The legislators of the 10th century recognized that social power was mainly not a product of “nobility”, but of that particular position created by state dependence, and as such the field of its application could expand to include those social contexts in which no nobility existed; a good example showing this is that simple soldiers were considered as socially superior compared to other farmers in a village\textsuperscript{177}.

The problem is partly interwoven with the profile of the so-called “military aristocracy”, which I intend to examine closely in the near future, but from which I will here bring forward two pieces of information.

The Novels regarding the δυνατοί provide clear definitions about who exactly could be considered δυνατός and in which context. This alone proves that there was a real interest in the provinces to exploit the opportunity provided by the new laws against those who could be included in the category of the powerful. A series of particular cases was examined, and among them those that concerned the military. In Novel 5 of 947 Emperor Constantine VII without any reservations called the military “corrupt, remiss in their duty, without any war experience, less noble than ants, more rapacious than wolves, who ripped off the money of the empire’s subjects because they could \textsuperscript{176} MORRIS, The powerful and the poor, 23, 26-27.

\textsuperscript{177} Svoronas, Novelles, no 4.80-84. On the soldiers in particular see MORRIS, The powerful and the poor, 11-12, 24-26; LEMERLE, Agrarian history, 115 f.; KAPLAN, Les hommes et la terre, 238-241.
not tax the enemy”179. A few years later, in a letter addressed to Michael Maleinos, but written allegedly on behalf of the emperor Romanos II, Theodore of Cyzicus179, with fake surprise, wondered how Michael Maleinos had failed to notice the way of living of his closest relatives, “who all concern themselves with thriving on, and prospering through, their own sword in life, and who might hurry to appropriate all that belongs to their neighbours”180.

178. Σβωρονος, Novelles, no 5.125-128. The idea appears to come from Chrysostom, see PG 50, 447 (Sermo in Ascensionem Domini Nostri Jesu Christi): Ποίαν οὖν ἐπὶ ἥρπευσι ἀπεφερόμενοι πασί, ὅταν καὶ ὅδων ἀναισθηθότεροι, καὶ βοῶν ἀλογώτεροι, καὶ χελιδόνος καὶ τρυγόνος ἀγγυμονέτεροι, καὶ μυρμήκων ἀσυνετώτεροι, καὶ λίθων ἀναισθηθότεροι, καὶ ὀφεων ἓκεν φαινόμεθα; See Morris, The powerful and the poor, 11.

179. Theodore, metropolitan of Cyzicus, was a close friend and advisor of Constantine VII. Nothing much is known about him, except that his brother was a μάγιστρος, which places him in the inner power circle around the emperor at this time. He was an enemy of patriarch Polyeuktos and he was exiled, to be reinstated shortly after, probably early in the reign of Romanos II. See ODB, 2043-2044, s.v. Theodore of Kyzikos (A. Kazhdan); Kazhdan, as above n. 127, 170-171. The letter to Maleinos suggests an early date for the metropolitan’s reinstatement, not only because Maleinos died in 961, but because it apparently contained advice on the exercise of authority that was not met with enthusiasm by the emperor. Therefore, this exchange of epistles took place shortly after Romanos II ascended the throne. Maleinos urged the emperor to follow his example (τὴν αὐτὴν ὁδὸν βαδίζειν με ἀξιοῖς). It would be unheard of if Maleinos really advised Romanos II to be tonsured (it equals to urging him to resign from office); the emperor replied that he was brought up by his tutor -Theodore himself, perhaps?) for royal life instead of a monastic one, and for caring for his subjects. The two collections of letters of Theodore have been re-edited recently, see Theodori Metropolitae Cyzici Epistulae, ed. M. Tziatzi-Papagianni [CFHB 48], Berlin 2012, no 7, here 21-22 (hereafter Theodori Cyzici epistulae). On the circumstances of Maleinos’ flight that ended with his tonsure see V. V lysidou, Quelques remarques concernant les activités de Saint Michel Maleinos, BSI 59 (1998), 46-51; Eadem, Αριστοκρατικές οικογένειες, 78-79, 84-87. Also see A. Laiou, The general and the saint: Michael Maleinos and Nikephoros Phokas, in: Ευψυχία. Melanges offerts a Hélène Ahrweiler [Byzantina Sorbonensia 16], Paris 1998, t. II, 399-412.

180. Theodori Cyzici epistulae, no 7.40-44: {Ὁ} Ὅ δὲ εἶ λέγων μὴ σπεύδειν ἐμὲ ἐπὶ τῇ μαχαίρᾳ μου εὐλογηθῆναι, θαυμάζω πῶς ὑπερεῖδες τοὺς ἐγγυτάτῳ σοι γένει προσήκοντας, ἅπαντας ἀπὸ τῆς οἰκείας μαχαίρας σπουδάζοντας λαβεῖν τὸ εὐδόκιμον καὶ ἀπὸ ταύτης κατὰ τὸν βίον προκόπτοντας, ἵνα δὲ καὶ πάντων τῶν γειτόνων ἰδία ποιεῖσθαι τιθεμένους σπουδήν. I decided to amend the text to make better sense for reasons of syntax: “while you said this, that I should not rush to find glory through my sword, I am amazed how you overlooked your closest relatives...”.

BYZANTINA SYMMEIKTA 26 (2016), 309-372
We might raise the objection that these models are not new, but are simply conventions applied to the military section of the aristocracy of Byzantium. In reality, as I will argue elsewhere, these profiles are quite old. But in no other time in Byzantium are they detected more clearly than in the 10th and 11th centuries. In his letter, Theodore of Cyzicus could have chosen an expression more neutral rather than openly accusing Maleinos’ relatives with bellicosity and greed that is satisfied only with the use of the sword. On the whole, the epistle contains unprecedented aggressiveness and poisonous irony that sends a clear message to Michael Maleinos: “even if the treasures coming from just sources would diminish, I wish I could make sure that the worthy would become rich in one day and that goods would spring forth for my subjects as if from a perpetual river and that nobody, whose wretchedness I would not be able to crush quickly, would be miserable”181. I remind to the reader that Romanos II is the emperor who annulled altogether and without reimbursement all property alienations to the powerful that had taken place after 945, independently of motives and circumstances in which they had taken place182.

VI. An expression of imperial omnipotence: taxis

The enhancement in the 10th century of the profiles discussed above proves that their use by central authorities intensified, therefore the tension between the government and the Byzantine aristocracy suddenly becomes more visible during the same period, culminating, in my opinion, in the 11th century. The phenomenon may be interpreted as a direct consequence of

181. Theodori Cyzici epistulae, no 7.52-56. This passage immediately follows the one cited above. It appears that Michael Maleinos in his own epistle reminded the emperor of the heroic deeds of his relatives, and perhaps asked for something in their or in his own favor, because the author shows no hesitation to reproach the monks for “nourishing many fat mules capable of carrying for you the freshness which alone can satisfy your blessed hunger” (ibid, no 7.36-37). The emperor implied in his answer that Maleinos should restrict himself to his own spiritual domain; by evoking the deeds of previous emperors down to the time of Alexander the Great and Constantine I, he apparently claimed that he was their immediate successor, which was in line with the legend about the descent of Basil I, and concluded that “as you said, I wish that I were not for this reason (because all these emperors had succumbed all the nations) the poorest of all those that live in my kingdom” (καὶ διὰ τοῦτο οὐδὲ περιστέρας εἶναι πάντων, ὡς δὲ ἔφης, ἐβουλώμην τῶν ἐν τῇ βασιλείᾳ μου).

the strengthening of the central authority observed under the Macedonian emperors. The state nourished the idea that the exercise of power is arranged around a central source, which is represented on earth only by imperial authority. The ultimate power, the “power of authority” (ἐξουσίας δυναστεία), in the words of the emperor Leon VI\textsuperscript{183}, only belongs to the emperor. Political and social influence and power is asserted at the emperor’s command or with his permission; other power poles are organized around him hierarchically, with absolute discipline and without objections. This conception of authority brings to mind the ideas expressed in the Dialog De scientia politica. Nevertheless, the fact that in middle Byzantium the emperor’s role in the hierarchy as a central source of power is enhanced, is fundamentally different from the idea expressed in the Dialog, where, as we have seen, the emperor appears only to confirm the role of the optimates, who trusted in their own position. In the 10th century, the nobles, the ἄριστοι, derive their existence, significance, social and political position only from the center. This perception reflects in total a different application of the notion of τάξις, which is excellently propagated in the prooimion of De Cerimonibus\textsuperscript{184}. In the prooimion of this text, the entire idea is reversed and turned to the benefit of imperial power.

The idea of τάξις as an inherent and indispensable component of a harmonious polity was developed by Aristotle\textsuperscript{185}. Pseudo-Dionysius, who elaborated on Proclus’ ideas\textsuperscript{186}, believed that τάξις is an inherent characteristic of ἱεραρχία (hierarchy); hierarchy is a method of return towards God\textsuperscript{187}. This \textsuperscript{183.} Leonis Tactica, 2.7-8.

\textsuperscript{184.} See commentary of this abstract in: Magdalino, Court society, 212-213; Kazhdan-Constable, People and power, 146.

\textsuperscript{185.} Aristotle Politica, 200, 1278b.9-12: ἐστὶ δὲ πολιτεία τάξις τῶν τε ἄλλων ἀρχῶν καὶ μᾶλλον τῆς κυρίας πάντων. Κύριον μὲν γὰρ πανταχοῦ τὸ πολίτευμα τῆς πόλεως, πολίτευμα δ’ ἐστὶν ἡ πολιτεία.

\textsuperscript{186.} Proclus applied the idea of τάξις to the heavenly world and claimed that the earthly world is unable to preserve the order. See W. Kroll, Procli Diadochi in Platonis rem publicam commentarii, Leipzig 1891 (repr. Amsterdam 1965), v. i, 146.23-147.1.

\textsuperscript{187.} Pseudo-Dionysius, De caelesti hierarchia, 17.3-11: ἐστὶ μὲν ἱεραρχία... τάξις ἱερὰ καὶ ἐπιστήμη καὶ ἐνέργεια πρὸς τὸ θεοειδὲς... ἀφομοιοιμένη καὶ πρὸς τὰς... αὐτή θεόθεν ἐλλάμψεις ἀναλόγως ἐπὶ τὸ θεομίμητον ἀναγομένη... Σκόπος οὖν ἱεραρχίας ἐστὶν ἡ πρὸς θεὸν ὡς ἐφικτὸν ἀφομοιοιμέστερον... Pseudo-Dionysius in reality invented the term ἱεραρχία. On his importance for the 6th c. and later see Bell, Social conflict, 252-258; A.
theory seems to underlie in Constantine Porphyrogennetus’ theory on imperial authority, which is contained in the prooimion of De Cerimoniis. Emperor Constantine VII states that imperial authority is governed by τάξις (διὰ τῆς ἐπαινετῆς τάξεως) because thus it is ordered (δεικνυμένης κοσμιωτέρας) and for this it is admired. The emperor then makes an interesting remark, as he compares a “royal polity” (βασιλικοῦ πολιτεύματος) without τάξις, with “private and unfree life” (ἰδιωτικῆς καὶ ἀνελευθέρου διαγωγῆς) to conclude that when imperial power (βασιλείου κράτους) is ruled by rhythm and τάξις, in reality it replicates “the harmony and motion of the Creator” (τοῦ δημιουργοῦ τὴν ἁρμονίαν καὶ κίνησιν). Constantine VII here frames a basic Aristotelian idea, τάξις, within a Neoplatonic context, but expands it: freedom is the principle that underlies sharing in authority, and the polity is a community of free people, therefore for someone not participating in the polity means not only that this person chooses private life, as Aristotle had said, but that his life is not free. The ἱδιώται (private persons) are in reality “unfree”, and for them there is no reason of distinction. Once again, true merit is acknowledged only to those who choose to serve in the context of imperial τάξις.

It is impossible not to bring the proemium of De Cerimoniis into association with a well known extract of Symeon the New Theologian, in which, however, there is no mention of taxis. But the writer, like Constantine VII, contrasts those who choose a private life away from public affairs, “who stay at their own houses”, or “live in their proasteia”, or “show cowardice and... waste their time at home enjoying the luxury” and those who “pay a service to the earthly king”, who follow him everywhere, serve in the army and show their bravery in the battlefield. Symeon rather sees a pyramid below the emperor, who is placed on its top. Through the archons the emperor is able to reach each and every subject of his empire: “the generals and all the archons, of which some are acquaintances and servants, some are even friends, and through each and every one of them also the people that obey to them, all are subjected to the emperor”. Thus the emperor’s authority spreads from the top to the bottom of the empire’s social structure; dependents of the notables, the generals and archons that are specifically mentioned, those who are affiliated with the great houses notwithstanding their status, all the people belong to the king, just like all people are servants of God193.

In the context described by Symeon the particular relations of the people with the archons are of no interest, because in reality it is the authority of the emperor that governs all relations. According to this perception, the archons acquire their importance because they are the vehicle through which imperial rule is diffused to the lower social strata; the dependence of the latter from the archons, if it exists, only serves imperial omnipotence. In reality, this model brings the relations that, as we have seen, could develop between archons, dynasts or the “powerful” with people at the other end

The editor translates the key phrase τοῦ βασιλέως εἰσί with “…sont... certains même des amis de l’empereur” because the author mentions that private persons are not in a position to know the emperor and speak to him (a direct allusion to παρρησία, the right to speak to a superior). In this translation the phrase would depend on φίλοι; in Greek, however, εἰμί also means “to belong”, in which case it governs predicative genitive, as here, τοῦ βασιλέως εἰσι. Accordingly, it is more correctly translated as “all are subjected to the emperor” or “all belong to the emperor” (which is exactly the reason why Symeon inserted a comma after φίλοι). Both Magdalino, Court society, 223, who uses Darrouzès’ translation in English, and Kazhdan – McCormick, Byzantine court, 167-168, believe that this passage refers to the court. Also see Kazhdan – Constable, People and power, 34-36, 90.

BYZANTINA SYMMEIKTA 26 (2016), 309-372

http://epublishing.ekt.gr | e-Publisher: EKT | Downloaded at 05/03/2021 02:14:44 |
of the social ladder, under a state cover. The possibility, or rather the fact, that these relations existed well outside the frame described is not examined in Symeon’s theoretical model. On the contrary, the social dominance of the emperor in his text is encompassing and is founded on the belief that “all people belong to the king”. It is not surprising that Symeon the New Theologian described the expansion of imperial authority in such a manner, since in his youth he was a member of the court. The possibility that he was influenced by the proemium of De Cerimoniis cannot be excluded, but in any case, the interdependence of the texts should be further investigated.

VII. Conclusions

There are many more observations that one can make about social distinctions in the middle Byzantine period and many more groups whose social profile needs to be investigated. The fact, though, remains, and this is of capital importance for understanding Byzantine society, that there were no clear social barriers between the “classes” in Byzantium. This created a particular social fluidity, a mobility that is manifest in the rise of certain persons to power, of which the most notable cases are those of Justin I and Basil I. It would, however, be a hasty conclusion to speak about an extremely mobile Byzantine society. Social developments are in reality

---

195. Justin would not have ascended to the throne had he not been enrolled in the only regiment of guards that did not require a large sum of money for enlisting, and Basil would not have had the chance to claim supreme power had he not sought to enter the clientele circles of powerful people such as Theophilos the droungarios of the Vigla, which allowed for his social elevation and the improvement of his economic situation. On the circumstances of Justin’s ascent to power see B. Croke, Justinian under Justin: Reconfiguring a Reign, BZ 100/1 (2007), 13-56, especially 16-22; Jones, LRE, 267-268, 658. Still, the possibility that Justin was enlisted in the Excutitores because of his good luck can be questioned; when he left his village, he headed straight to Constantinople, and it is quite possible that he bought a position in the Scholae, from which he was transferred to the Excutitores. This would mean that he possessed enough wealth for such a purchase in the first place. On Theophilos or Theophilizites, who was a relative of the emperor and held the office of droungarios of the Vigla, or, according to another testimony, comes of the Walls, see M. Herlong, Kinship more complicated. The loosening of social barriers is the result of a long process that features the strengthening of imperial authority, reinforced by, and reflected in, the legislation of the later Roman empire. The class that was damaged the most from this process was the aristocracy, and this created tensions from as early as the 6th century, which are detected, as we have seen, in the Dialog De scientia politica, and –what is mostly known– in the Anecdotes of Prokopios. Under the influence of Justinian, Emperor Justin I probably abolished the last obstacle that forbade social upgrading to people belonging to the infames by proclaiming with a famous law that their social improvement was possible under conditions. The rights of the aristocracy were generally interwoven with the power and the social delimitation of the senate. But Justin under the influence of Justinian produced a law that transferred the responsibility for selecting candidates for the Scholae to the emperor. The measure, apart from its economic consequences, in time

196. _CJ_, 5.4.23. The law refers specifically to women with a view to the possibility of conducting lawful marriage, but its impact should not be underestimated. The emperor proclaims in the prooimion that people should have a second chance in life, just as God forgives the sins of men. He then compares slaves to women condemned to have no rights on account of their occupation: as slaves were upgraded to high positions by imperial privilege, so should women be given the hope of social upgrading. The _condicio_ is mentioned many times in the law by emphasizing on the possibility, or, in the context of the law, the “human right” to change it and thus obtain the hope for social improvement. See J. _Beaucamp_, _Le statut de la femme a Byzance (4e-7e siècle)_, I. _Le droit imperial_ [TM Monographies 5], Paris 1990, 202-210, esp. 206-208. The author maintains that the law is exceptional and not exclusive of previous laws which forbid marriage to noblemen. Also see _Krumholz_, _Aspekte_, 167-168. Both analyses, however, confuse the _εὐτελεῖς_ (inferiores, humiliores), or _πένητες_ (poor), with the infames. But see _Humfress_, _Civil law_, 205-218, who comments extensively on this type of confusion in the sources and their modern interpretation.

197. _CJ_, 1.31.5. The law probably involved -but not actually stated it- the transfer of the income from the sale of Scholae positions from the _sacrae largitiones_ to the _σακέλλη_. For this reason, Justinian was apparently in a position to enlist a large number of Scholarioi while preparing his own ascent to the throne. Prokopios, _Hist. arc._, 149.20-150.4, accuses Justinian for taking their money but dismissing the new Scholarii without refund after his ascent to the throne. The law is dated to May, 523, therefore it is not directly linked to his ascent but rather points to a reform of the enlistment system in the Scholae. Also see _Jones_, apparently contributed to the transformation of the aristocratic senatorial hierarchy into a hierarchy centered at the palace, in which the opinion of the emperor about the people surrounding him mattered the most; it further increased the authority of the emperor on deciding who, under what circumstances and for what purpose a person would, independently of descent or economic influence, be accepted into the inner power circles of the palace. This development is evident in seal inscriptions from the early 8th century and in the long run undermined the senate, its aristocratic composition, prestige and power.

And yet no convincing argument can be articulated that would prove that there was no real aristocracy in Byzantium. What we see in the sources and is puzzling concerning the existence or not of a delimited upper stratum is only the absence of its legal consolidation. No law ever secured special handling for any member of the great families. On the one hand, this resulted in the renewal and mobility of the aristocracy, which was additionally augmented by the emperor’s right to appoint men of his own choice to higher hierarchal positions. But most importantly, it created insecurity among those standing at the top of the social ladder, since their position, their prosperity and its maintenance was only conditional, to the point that consolidation of position remained a desideratum until the late 11th century. Conversely, noble families were under no restriction whatsoever to project to their environment their nobility, by taking pride in their lineages, their noble parents, or by displaying their wealth, but their standing was not enshrined in a systemic social frame. Without legal or political investment, “nobility”, hence “aristocratic” identity, remained until the late 11th century a subject of ideological proclamation and self-projection. The governments of the 9th-10th centuries, asserted very strongly their role in the creation and maintenance of that nobility.

They did not really deserve such an assertion; as we have seen, there are specific conditions of economic, political, social and military nature that favour the rise of the aristocracy. Indeed, the aristocracy exists based on its exceptional gifts that it claims for itself and are recognized by others, and these concern, as has been explained above, descent par excellence - including locality- and wealth, as well as its claim to virtues – philanthropy, bravery etc– and physical appearance. In my opinion it cannot be doubted that a certain kind of antagonism of the upper social strata with the emperors of the Macedonian dynasty existed and led to the fabrication of the legend concerning the descent of its founder, Emperor Basil I, to match the legends of other families. But it is not just about descent.

The evidence examined here suggests that this competition was fully developed in the 10th century. The rulers of the Macedonian dynasty were always conscious that at least some part of the aristocracy was at times, or even constantly, on the lookout for an opportunity to claim the throne. The system worked for the benefit of the state by pulling the nobles and their resources towards it. Thus it can also be seen as an element of unification, of the rallying of the upper social strata around the emperor, and of minimizing the danger posed by centrifugal forces in the provinces. In this context, the question as to why Romanos I Lakapenos suddenly allowed for the nobility of service to be targeted in the legislation of the 10th century may remain forever without a convincing answer -at this point I have to underline again that, delimiting the group of the “powerful” to the nobility of service, is a true novelty of the Byzantine legislation. We could interpret this development in terms of political sympathies; it is well known, for example, that certain families, notably the Phokas and the Maleinoi, were rivals of Romanos I.

---

201. Vlysidou, Αριστοκρατικές οικογένειες, 90-94; Cheynet, Les Phocas, 480-481; Idem, Pouvoir, 321; Laiou, as above n. 179, 405-406. Also see Holmes, as above n. 111, 56-61, who believes that the Novel of 996 targeted at the influence of Basil Lakapenos and served as “a declaration of intent and terror”.

BYZANTINA SYMMEIKTA 26 (2016), 309-372
and thus the possibility cannot be excluded that the emperor was seeking to restrain any opposition to his regime. Another option for explaining the law of 934 would be to acknowledge that it was all about resources of wealth, i.e. the possession of land and manpower, which is specifically recorded in the Novel\textsuperscript{202}. But tenth-century laws on landownership in reality channelled underlying political and social dissension against the nobility and the modes of its social and economic operation under the pretext of the care for the poor. In fact, they created a potentially dangerous political environment, since the people that were called to provide their services to state and government were attacked at the foundations of their position, meaning their wealth and their social influence. This contradiction created an explosive political mixture that underlay politics in the 10th century: the emperors of the Macedonian dynasty incriminated their own civil and military servants\textsuperscript{203}.

The proclamation that nobility exists only around the emperor was meant to reinforce the emperor's role against the nobility's deep social entrenchment and vindication of its rights. In effect, it was declared in the most clear and official manner that only one source of power existed in Byzantium, only one creator of social distinction. It was the outcome of a process, which, as we have seen, liberated the lower social strata from their Roman bondage and gave them space for social and economic growth under the law. But at the same time this development effected the disappearance of separate subgroups of the upper social strata. Distinction bound exclusively to state hierarchy for the noble, and abrogation of social limits, for people

\begin{thebibliography}{9}
\bibitem{202} \textsc{svoronos}, \textit{Novelles}, no 3.63-74; \textsc{ostrogorsky}, as above n. 60, 16-19; \textsc{idem}, \textit{Aristocracy}, 6-7; \textsc{lemerle}, \textit{Agrarian history}, 105-108; \textsc{kaplan}, \textit{Les hommes et la terre}, 424-426; \textsc{haldon}, \textit{Social élites}, 183-184; \textsc{magdalino}, \textit{Court society}, 228; \textsc{patlagean}, \textit{Ellηνικός μεσαίωνας}, 271-273; \textsc{morris}, The Powerful and the poor, 23-27. Generally on the importance of land possession with references to the problem of the \textit{δυνατοί} see \textsc{francopan}, Land and power, 112-136, esp. 126-128.
\bibitem{203} Traces of this attitude towards the civil and military aristocracy are found earlier, but it appears to me that the conflict culminates in the 10th c. See the characteristic comment of J. \textsc{dillon}, \textit{The Justice of Constantine. Law, Communication, and Control}, Michigan 2012, 90: “The edicts of Constantine portray an emperor locked in contest... with the very administration that serves in his name”. The phenomenon appears to be an aspect of the increasing state centralization but it needs to be investigated further.
\end{thebibliography}
at the other end of the ladder—and, we should add, for those in between—as portrayed in the legislation of the 6th century and later, are the two sides of one and the same evolution, which was made possible only under the protection of an almost almighty emperor. The absence of real and institutionalized social barriers favored this particular fluidity of society in Byzantium. As we have seen, this involved the containment of the nobility to the ungracious role of state servant. Indeed, Byzantium used the theory of Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite not for securing the position of the upper social strata, or for confining the other classes to an inferior and unchanging situation, but for strengthening the central authority with the aid of the law. The law sprang only from imperial autocracy and demanded this particular type of “social equality” with the purpose that justice be served better. This principle, which is already detected in Justinian I’s legislation204, could only be implemented with—in reality it would not have worked without—the levelling of social distinctions, that placed the state at the center of social organization and order. The result is very clear: the “aristocracy” in the end only had the ephemeral certainty of being awarded the privilege to “dine with

204. See primarily Troianos, Πηγές, 102-104, 119-121; Simon, Gesetzgebung, 28-35; J. Lokin, The significance of Law, 71-76, 82, 89-90; C. Humfress, Law and Legal Practice in the Age of Justinian, in: The age of Justinian, 167-170; C. Humfress, Laws’ Empire: Roman Universalism and Legal Practice, in: The City, 81-108; Bell, Social conflict, 291-297; Jones, LRE, 470-471, 516-522. We tend to take access to law for granted in the Byzantine period, but until the codification of Justinian I there was no exclusive source of law; knowing it, using it, evoking the law when necessary was much more a process connected to the actual social status of a litigant than a simple bureaucratic procedure that led to the administration of justice. Justinian I made the three parts of the Codex the only source of law, thus unifying its application and reinforcement throughout the empire; he forbade its corruption through the addition of comments, and ordered the clarification of obscure points and the elimination of all contradictions; he finally ordered that copies should be sent to each province of the empire. The effort taken for the unification of the law, its expansion and uniform application, which would facilitate, in the eyes of the legislator, that all subjects be equally received and judged in a court of law, was unprecedented and was complemented with administrative measures designed to strengthen the authority of local judges. To borrow the words of a reference quoted above, Justinian I in reality created a “laws’ empire”. Lokin further explains that Justinian’s idea of the law was a secular one (a Roman idea, if I may add), but it led to the formulation that the law springs only from God and that the emperor is His instrument for establishing justice on earth, which is clearly found in the Eisagoge of Photios.
the emperor”, that could be taken away at any moment. In effect, Byzantine nobility was unable to secure its position against a possible infringement of its rights by the imperial authority; on the contrary, “the poor”, meaning the socially “weak”, were awarded latitude to claim their own rights. In a sense, then, Byzantium was much more a “modern” state than any of its western contemporary states. This was the legacy of middle Byzantium, one that the Komnenoi appropriated, in spite of the fact that, under Alexios I, the aristocracy consolidated its position in the new hierarchical system for the first time. Nevertheless, the parallel existence of a nobility that based its excellence on its relation to the imperial family, of a powerful central authority and of a still fluid society, in the long run created problems that became obvious in the period that followed, especially after 1261 under the Palaeologan dynasty.
ΚΟΙΝΩΝΙΚΑ ΠΡΟΦΙΛ ΣΤΟ BYZANTIΟ. ΠΑΡΑΤΗΡΗΣΕΙΣ ΣΧΕΤΙΚΑ ΜΕ ΤΙΣ ΒΥΖΑΝΤΙΝΕΣ ΑΝΤΙΛΗΨΕΙΣ ΓΙΑ ΤΗΝ ΔΙΑΚΡΙΣΗ ΤΩΝ ΚΟΙΝΩΝΙΚΩΝ ΟΜΑΔΩΝ

Η παρούσα μελέτη συμπυκνώνει το αποτέλεσμα μιας τριετούς έρευνας για την κοινωνική ιστορία του Βυζαντίου, που είχε ως στόχο την διερεύνηση της κοινωνικής ορολογίας των Βυζαντινών και την θεωρητική της ταξινόμηση. Η κοινωνική ορολογία που χρησιμοποιούσαν οι ίδιοι οι Βυζαντινοί εξυπηρέτησε την δημιουργία κοινωνικών προφίλ που αφορούσαν τόσο διαφορετικές κοινωνικές ομάδες, όσο και, ίσως συχνότερα, άτομα, προκειμένου για την κατάταξή τους σε ένα συγκεκριμένο κοινωνικό επίπεδο. Τα προφίλ αυτά διέπουν την κοινωνική θεώρηση στο Βυζάντιο και αποτέλεσαν αντικείμενο μεταχείρισης τόσο από το ίδιο το κράτος όσο και από τις ομάδες ή τα άτομα στα οποία αφορούσαν. Οι παράμετροι που τα συνθέτουν υπήρχαν συνεπώς υλικό για τον κοινωνικό αυτοπροσδιορισμό ή ετεροπροσδιορισμό. Η έρευνα οδήγησε σε αποσαφήνιση των παραμέτρων που υπήρχαν στην ένταξη στα κατώτερα κοινωνικά στρώματα διακρίνοντας τις κατηγορίες των infames/ἀτίμων από εκείνες των ἀχρήστων, των ἀφανῶν και των πενήτων για να καταλήξει στο συμπέρασμα ότι αφενός η απουσία καταχώρισης της ανώτερης κοινωνικής τάξης του Βυζαντίου δημιούργησε εντάσεις, ιδιαίτερως μεταξύ 1οου και 11ου αιώνα, αφετέρου ωστόσο η παράλληλη ισχυροποίηση της κεντρικής εξουσίας λειτούργησε προστατευτικά υπέρ των μεσαίων και κατώτερων στρωμάτων, γεγονός που δίνει την εντύπωση ότι το Βυζάντιο ήταν, τελικά, ένα «σύγχρονο» χράτος. Για να καταλήξει σε αυτό το συμπέρασμα, η έρευνα καταθέτθηκε την διερεύνηση της κοινωνικής σχεδόν καθόλου ομάδας όπως οι δυνατοί και οι δυνάστες, ενώ κατεβλήθη προσπάθεια να αποφασηνιστεί συνοπτικά η βυζαντινή αντίληψη περί ευγένειας και να εξεταστεί ο ρόλος του πλούτου για την δημιουργία κοινωνικής «θέσης».