THE JUDGE AS HIEROPHANT IN PSELLOS' OR. MIN. 14*

1. Introduction

The Problematics of Psellos' Hermeneutics in General

One of the main issues in research on Psellos is determining his philosophical stance. He is most often presented as a Neoplatonic philosopher and an advocate for the exaltation of philosophy in relation to theology. Some researchers argue that he attempted to break with the Christian world, even if only covertly¹. In earlier years, there was even a hypothesis concerning a 'religion of philosophers'². Other scholars regard Psellos as a Christian philosopher who was not opposed to Christianity, while emphasizing that his method is purely philosophical³. However, a question that goes beyond the relationship between Psellos' philosophy and Christianity concerns the genre of his philosophy: on which branch of philosophy does he place particular emphasis, and what is his basic philosophical position⁴?

In my recent studies on the hermeneutics of Niketas Stethatos⁵ and of Psellos⁶, the importance of hermeneutics in Psellos' thought was highlighted. In the second study, which focused on Psellos, it was argued that this constituted his preeminent philosophical proposal. The study also suggested that Psellos presents the proposal as his own, that is, as a Psellian rather than a Neoplatonic philosophy. The same study distinguished two main aspects of this theory: one aspect was more philosophical, wherein Psellos emphasizes the need for a philosophical method and philosophical allegorisis during interpretation; the other was more mystical, based on the ancient world.

A basic tool of his hermeneutical theory is the interpreter's role as a hierophant⁷, who is permitted to see and reveal the hidden mysteries of an adyton, in the context of the symbolic interpretation of a ceremony, modeled on the Eleusinian Mysteries⁸. In the aforementioned studies, these

7. The hierophant was the high priest of the Eleusinian Mysteries; he had the right to access the sanctuary, from where, at the height of the ceremony, he displayed the sacred things, that is, revealed and explained to the initiated the mysteries of the adyton. See *LSJ*⁹, entry ἱεροφάντης; G. E. MYLONAS, Eleusis and the Eleusinian Mysteries, Princeton – New Jersey 1961 (1969), 69, 84-86, 226, 229-230, 236, 273, 282; K. CLINTON, The Sacred Officials of the Eleusinian Mysteries, Transactions of the American Philosophical Society 64.3 (1974), 1-143 (on hierophantes 10-47); K. DOWDEN, Grades in the Eleusinian Mysteries, Revue de l'histoire des religions 197.4 (1980), 409-427. Therefore, the hierophant combines two crucial elements for Psellos' thought, the entry into the sanctuary and the revelation of the hidden sacred things, i.e. the interpretation.

concepts were related to the intellectual issues of Psellos' time, particularly his confrontation with the mystical theology of the eleventh century and its chief representative, Niketas Stethatos. I discussed relevant passages, mainly in the *Theologica*⁹ and *Allegorica*¹⁰, as well as some passages in the *Encomium in matrem*¹¹ and other writings of Psellos¹².

Psellos' Philosophical Background

Psellos draws the association between philosophy and mystery cults, particularly the Eleusinian Mysteries, from a long philosophical tradition. This tradition originates with Plato¹³ and culminates in Neoplatonism,

13. Plato's Phaedrus, Phaedo, Symposium formed a focal point for the reference to the encompassing Stoic Philosophy¹⁴, Middle Platonism¹⁵, and the Second Sophistic¹⁶. In this context, philosophical thought was deeply influenced by the initiatory language and imagery of mystery cults, which were used to describe the philosophical experience and to provide a theoretical basis for the gradual access to knowledge and union with the divine.

In Neoplatonism, references to the Mysteries –rooted in the Platonic theology of Proclus– became central, along with the use of terminology and symbolism derived from the mystery cults introduced by Plato. In particular, references aligning the hierophant of the Eleusinian Mysteries with the philosopher as a revealer of knowledge appear in the works of Plotinus¹⁷, mysteries, see B. M. DINKELAAR, Plato and the Language of Mysteries. Orphic /Pythagorean and Eleusinian Motifs and Register in Ten Dialogues, Mnemosyne. A Journal of Classical Studies 73 (2020), 36-62 (49-58 on the Eleusinian Mysteries) and contributed substantially to the dissemination and elaboration of the lexicon of mystery cults from the Hellenistic period onwards. For example, in the imperial period, philosophers following Plato created models of philosophical initiation based on the rites of mystery cults, especially the Eleusinian Mysteries, see N. BREMMER, Initiation into the Mysteries in Ancient World, Berlin-Boston 2014; cf. also C. 16. A kind of 'sacralization' of Platonic philosophy is observed, coinciding with a 'mysteric turn'. The mysteric terminology was extended to many sciences such as medicine (e.g., Galen), mathematics (e.g., Theon of Smyrna), and rhetoric and became commonplace, see the articles in N. BELAYCHE – F. MASSA – P. HOFFMANN (eds), Les mystères au IIe siècle de notre ère: un tournant [Bibliothèque de l'École des hautes études, Sciences religieuses 187], Turnhout 2021.

Marinus¹⁸, and Proclus¹⁹. Mysteries and myths (along with their allegorical interpretations) were regarded as “two parallel paths leading human beings to the divine”²⁰. Specifically, the rite was seen as a “mythe en acte”²¹.

However, philosophy also shaped the conceptual structure of mystery cults, primarily through the process of platonization (as described by Turcan), since the obscure teachings of the mysteries required philosophical clarification. This process culminated in Neoplatonism after Plotinus. The Great Eleusinian Mysteries were seen as parallel to Platonic philosophy, whereas the Lesser Eleusinian Mysteries were associated with Aristotelian studies²². In the preface to *Platonic Theology*²³, Proclus attests to the direct connection between philosophy and mysteric revelations. The Neoplatonic curriculum, together with exegetical teaching, was accepted as a path that mirrored the rituals of the mystery cults²⁴.

18. Similarly, Marinus uses the term in relation to Proclus, in Πρόκλος ἡ περὶ εὐδαμονίας, 19.483-487: καὶ γὰρ πρόχειρον ἐκεῖνο εἶχεν αἰεὶ καὶ ἔλεγεν ὁ θεοσεβέστατος ἀνὴρ ὅτι τὸν φιλόσοφον προσήκει οὐ μίᾳς τινὸς πόλεως οὐδὲ τῶν παρ' ἐνίοις πατρίων εἶναι θεραπευτὴν, κοινῇ δὲ τοῦ ὅλου κόσμου ἱεροφάντην, ed. R. MASULLO, Marino di Neapoli. Vita di Proclo [Speculum], Napoli 1985. See on this passage also DIAMANTOPOULOS, Η ερμηνευτική, 565. For the hypothesis of Proclus' influence on Psellos' symbolism of the hierophant, see DIAMANTOPOULOS, Η ερμηνευτική, 564-568.

H. D. SAFFREY – L. G. WESTERINK: Proclus: Théologie platonicienne, vol. 1, Paris 1968. Proclus calls Plato a hierophant, because he reveals the mysteries of philosophy, as the hierophant of the ancient mysteries revealed the hidden sacred objects, see also note 1 of the editor.

Aim of the Study

My intention in this paper is to analyze a text that further strengthens this argument, as it extends into the field of Byzantine jurisprudence. I will specifically examine Psellos' mystical references in Or. min. 14²⁵, entitled Εἰς τινὰ κάπηλον γενόμενον νομικόν (To some tavern keeper who became a judge) as a further testimony to the importance he attributes to the language of ancient ceremonies and the figure of the hierophant in the context of hermeneutics. In this work, he extends initiatory language and imagery to everyday culture, even while speaking ironically about it. Psellos criticizes the son of a tavern owner who wished to become a judge²⁶ without gradually acquiring a legal education. In this context, he introduces the imagery of initiation and the hierophant's entry into an adyton. He also presents other arguments and images in this work, with the main point of reference being the material culture of the craft of the κάπηλοι and Byzantine oenology, in addition to Greek mythology. However, he places particular emphasis on mystical argumentation.

Key Passages under Discussion

I quote the key passages from Littlewood's edition (Or. min. 14.31-66 and 151-161) along with English translations²⁷, to enhance the accessibility and clarity of my argument:

Belgique 2021, 193-203; see also P. HADOT, The Divisions of the Parts of Philosophy in Antiquity [1979], in: The Selected Writings of Pierre Hadot: Philosophy as Practice, M. SHARPE – F. TESTA (transl.), London 2020, ch. 6, 105-132, esp. 119 sq. See more on that issue in Or. min. 14 in section Grades of Initiation in Jurisprudence and Philosophical Initiation in Plato's Academy.

25. Or. min. 14, ed. Littlewood. Perhaps the Or. min. 14 is related to the previous work in Littlewood's edition, Πρὸς τινὰ κάπηλον μέγανυχον καὶ φιλοσοφούντα διάκενα Or. min. 13, because, firstly, the addressee of the speeches is probably the same person and, secondly, similar issues are raised (need for pre-education for philosophy and law). See also the editor's foreword of both works.

26. Although in Byzantium νομικός means scribe or secretary, or teacher of law, see ODB, vol. 2, entry Nomikos (A. KAZHDAN), here Psellos refers to a scholar of law and mainly to a judge, as can be seen from the descriptions of the duties of his addressee, see Or. min. 14.2, 14-21, 54-55, 84, 169-170 (issuing adjudications); 23, 87-88, 129-131, 148-150 (jurisprudence's scholar); 91-92, 155-156 (legislation and adjudication), not excluding an advocate's duties, see ib., 107-119.

27. I am grateful to Prof. Stratis Papaioannou for reading my translations that follow and for his very useful comments.

“And an Egyptian who has received an order to translate a Greek word would give up the undertaking and, thinking prudently, object to the order; for how could he translate a word he had never spoken? But you, while you have learned neither the Greek nor the Egyptian language, I do not know whether, having taken courage from the Egyptian underground galleries, you marched confidently towards the Stoa, or, having taken courage from our own sanctuaries, you proceeded self-assured towards the Nile. Indeed, I would gladly ask you: which of the two arts, I mean the tavern-keeper’s art and the knowledge of law (for handicraft must also be counted among the arts), is more august than the other, both in word and form? You will certainly give precedence, if you are not drunk, to the law, but then would join the club and give precedence to the lower art – for I know from your white hair that you have grown old practicing that unseemly work. So then, when your father established you at the boiler or brought you to the jiggers, did he immediately command you to change the wine too and allow you to mix the liquids, that is, these sacred and innermost things of your august art? But of course, how would you have done these things even if you had been allowed to, since you would have been before puberty and your age would not yet permit the most advanced actions? So, you would first light

30. According to Stratis Papaioannou the phrase ἐκ τῶν τριόδων καὶ τῶν βαράθρων is a citation. Indeed, it is attested in Gregorius Nazianzenus, Katὰ Ἰουλιανοῦ Βασιλέως Στηλιτευτικὸς πρῶτος (Or. 4), ed. J. BERNARDI, Grégoire de Nazianze: Discours 4-5, Contre Julien [Sources Chrétiennes 309], Paris 1983, 43.6-7, from whom Psellos obviously draws, as he is very well familiar with Gregorius’ writings, and he cites them very often. The phrase is also found in Nikephorus I of Constantinople, Ἀντίρρησις τρίτη, in: PG 100, col. 492A. Psellos uses the phrase also in other writings, Χρονογραφία, 6.177.5-6; Πρὸς τὴν σύνοδον κατηγορία τοῦ ἀρχιερέως, ed. G. T. DENNIS, Michaelis Pselli orationes forenses et acta [Bibliotheca scriptorum Graecorum et Romanorum Teubneriana], Stuttgart 1994 [= Or. for.], 1.1072-1073; Ad incertam personam, Ep. 488.42-43. There is no relevant reference in the critical apparatus of Littlewood’s edition. I thank Prof. Papaioannou for this useful reference. For the terms τριόδων, βαράθρων see below, notes 87 and 88.

the cauldron from below and then bring the torches, and thoroughly wash the vessels for the cups. Are you not then ashamed if, although you did not immediately become a tavern keeper, but first worked very hard to the point of falling asleep on the ground in the vestibule of the altar, now that you are about to serve the sacred science of law, you immediately took on the office of a *dadouchos*³¹, and proceeded straight into the sanctuaries, without having been initiated beforehand into the history of the laws, nor into the wisdom of the Twelve Tables, nor having received knowledge of the themes of the law of the Praetorians, but rather you ascended immediately to the Digestae and the Codices, so as not to receive from others, but to distribute to others the great provisions of law?

And the wise Plato did not allow those who wanted to philosophize to proceed immediately to theology, but first he trained his students in ethics, from there he referred them to the philosophy of natural phenomena, then he opened to them the entrance to mathematics and thus, after tuning them harmoniously to the rules of dialectics, from there he gave them wings towards theology. But you, as if you had overcome the matters of the laws like some narrow valley, have advanced to the untrodden city and have become a prophet as well as hierophant, even though you come from a trivium and from pits. And before you had even washed your hands from the water of your kettle, you dared to touch the sacred books. Then, after placing the books on your knees and solemnly browsing through what is inside, you do what the proverb says: ‘a donkey, moving the ears to the lyre’;”

“And in the mysteries of the Greeks no one dared to participate without first having been initiated into the ceremony of Mithras; although there was certainly a law for the initiated ones to keep the Eleusinian Mysteries secret and not utter a word, which is certainly the easiest anyhow and is not contrary to anything. However, you, while you are set to philosophize with the Muses, legislate with the wise, and judge with the rulers, you showed so much courage in everything that you immediately wiped your hands and grabbed the heavenly dome. Thus, you showed such complete ignorance of the fact that the science of laws not only investigates political matters with precision, but also has mysteries of theology and speaks of nature and leaves rhetoric behind, as Hecate leaves nature, if you had paid any attention to the Chaldean Oracles”.

State of Research

To date, this text has received little attention, and certainly not from a hermeneutic standpoint³². Moreover, research so far has frequently highlighted the philosophization of rhetoric³³ –and rarely of jurisprudence– in Psellos’ thought³⁴. However, the mystical hermeneutic aspect of Psellos’ philosophy of jurisprudence has not been examined at all, nor has

Jurisprudence and Philosophy in Psellos' Thought

However, we must first briefly examine the relationship between philosophy and law in Psellos' thought³⁵. The Byzantine philosopher, in Or. min. 14, makes only a few allusions to this issue and includes only one reference to the mythical legislators, Minos and Rhadamanthys³⁶, whom he apparently regards as models of legislation. To seek further evidence regarding Psellos' views on the connection between law and philosophy, we may turn to Or. fun. 3, his *Funeral Oration for Patriarch Xiphilinos*³⁷. It can be assumed that Xiphilinos (1064-1075) serves as a counterexample to Psellos' criticism of the tavernkeeper's son³⁸.

Psellos raises the issue of the relationship between law and philosophy in Or. fun. 3, as well as in other works. He establishes a hierarchy, placing philosophy above law³⁹. The former concerns inner beauty, highlighting

38. However, WOLSKA-CONUS, L'école, 55, 58 considers that Psellos in Or. fun. 3 in the person of Xiphilinos also presents his own philosophical concepts and methods regarding the law. I consider it important that Psellos in Or. fun. 3 exalts not only the knowledge and correct use of the rules of philosophy, but that Xiphilinos applied this method without having been taught it but discovered it through his own efforts, see Or. fun. 3.6.6-9, 28-33, 40-44. In other words, he raises an issue that, as we will see, is particularly important for the text I am examining in this study, namely the discovery of a truth that is considered rather hidden.

the deeper meaning of the word, while the latter deals with earthly matters⁴⁰. Law, according to Psellos, requires a philosophical foundation based on its methods⁴¹. Consequently, he exalts the use of philosophical methods⁴², particularly dialectic⁴³, in which the influence of Neoplatonic philosophy is evident⁴⁴. He also values the application of First Philosophy

See discussion on the work and on the passage 1-9, where the relation of philosophy to jurisprudence (dialectical methodology) in WOLSKA-CONUS, L'école, 69-70, 77-78. The researcher considers that the writing has not been substantially influenced by philosophy, despite its sophisticated title. She considers that, in general, there are only few elements of Psellos' personal contribution in his legal writings. He follows the tradition of the classical manuals of jurisprudence; however, he colors them with some philosophical thoughts while remaining in generalities.

42. Or. fun. 3.6.13-28, 33-46; 22.41-52. LORIMER, Aristotelis qui fertur libellus de mundo, Paris 1933, 394b13-395a5. But this too is part of a discussion about philosophical methods.

43. Or. fun. 3.6.6-9. In verses 9-13 he refers to the need to use the philosophical methods of division and reduction, definition and demonstration in all sciences, implying, of course, also in law. These are the methods that we saw in Ὅτι φιλοσοφίας μέτοχος ἡ νομικὴ ἐπιστήμη. At the same point, however, Psellos teaches that there is something that is above them, which should not be approached, because it is supernatural. This connects us more closely with what Psellos teaches in more detail in Or. min. 14, see Jurisprudence and the Chaldean Oracles. See also Or. fun. 3.22.36-40 where he also refers to the relationship of the methods of division and reduction with First Philosophy and Theol. 1.3.178-180.

in law, namely, the reduction of everything to a primary cause⁴⁵. However, Psellos teaches that philosophy and law are interdependent. Despite the superiority of philosophy, it also requires jurisprudence and rhetoric to achieve completeness in thought and speech⁴⁶. Psellos himself stated that he served both disciplines, considering engagement with law necessary despite the supremacy of philosophy⁴⁷. In fact, Kazhdan argues that in Psellos' thought, philosophy, rhetoric, and the science of law are sister disciplines. Nevertheless, jurisprudence also retains certain practical aspects⁴⁸.

In what follows, I examine the unique contributions of Or. min. 14 to this philosophical view of jurisprudence, in which the language of the ancient mysteries dominates.

2. Mysticism of Egyptian Culture and of Tavern-keeper's Art (καπηλεία)

Egyptian secret teachings and ἄδυντα of Philosophy

Psellos criticizes the former innkeeper by providing the following example: If an Egyptian who had never spoken Greek was ordered to interpret Greek into Egyptian, he would certainly object⁴⁹. Psellos therefore likens the process of transitioning from a practical art to a science to an act of interpretation treating the two fields (the art of innkeeping and the law) as foreign languages belonging to different cultures. Applying the example of Procli Diadochi in primum Euclidis Elementorum librum commentarii [Bibliotheca scriptorum Graecorum et Romanorum Teubneriana], Lipsiae 1873 (Hildesheim 1967), pp. 42-43. She discussed the application of these principles to the mentioned passages in Or. fun. 3, exposing their content, but she considered it difficult to ascertain what the real relationship is between Neoplatonism and jurisprudence according to Psellos. She also found arbitrariness in his theoretical thinking, as it is based only on approximations and confusions of terms and procedures.

interpretation to the case of the judge, he introduces a metaphor based on the Egyptian underground galleries (σύριγγες) and the Nile River. Σύριγγες were the underground passages leading to the tombs of the Egyptian kings in Thebes, Egypt⁵⁰. These were connected to the Nile because of their proximity; to reach them, one had to cross the river⁵¹.

According to Psellos, without the tavern-keeper's son knowing either language (i.e., Egyptian or Greek), he advanced either from the σύριγγες of the Egyptians to Stoic philosophy⁵² or from the Greek adyta to the Nile. The Byzantine philosopher states that he does not know which of the two actually occurred⁵³. In these metaphors, the Egyptian galleries and the Nile symbolize the art of the innkeeper, while philosophy is associated with jurisprudence. In both cases, there is a graduation from a lower to a higher level (Nile and σύριγγες; Stoic philosophy and adyta). This is shown by the fact that from the Nile one reached the σύριγγες, and because the adyton requires higher forms of knowledge, as we shall see below. According to Psellos' metaphor, the tavern-keeper's son confused the two cultures, considering them to be identical. Not only did he make the mistake of acting as an interpreter of languages he did not know, but he also considered himself capable of doing something more advanced. In other words, the judge is criticized for believing his past as a tavern keeper sufficient for his transition to legal science, without acquiring a legal education. In fact, it seems that Psellos is also questioning the judge's knowledge of καπηλεία. Moreover, Psellos acknowledges that the two disciplines are fundamentally distinct, akin to two foreign cultures.

However, they share certain characteristics that establish a common denominator. Noteworthy is the invocation of the philosophy's adyton (ἐκ τῶν παρ' ἡμῖν ἀδύτων), by which he means jurisprudence. In fact, Stoic philosophy is considered a kind of precursor to jurisprudence. Psellos places the adyton of law at the pinnacle of his hierarchical scheme, since, as will be discussed later, it is presented as the preeminent space occupied by the highest figure in the hierarchy of initiation, namely, the hierophant. Consequently, Stoic philosophy constitutes a preliminary stage.

But why does Psellos place the Stoa within a mystery framework? It is important to note that, among the Stoics, philosophy incorporated concepts drawn from the imagery of initiation within the context of mystery cults⁵⁴. The foundation of allegory is found in Stoicism⁵⁵, which led to its establishment as a dominant philosophical tool for centuries. Allegoresis, primarily in the sense of revealing hidden meanings, is inextricably linked to the concept of the hierophant, the sanctuary, and initiation, as well as to the methods of philosophy in Psellos' thought more broadly, as I have already shown⁵⁶. These factors may explain Psellos' reference to Stoic philosophy in relation to the adyton, as they render Stoic philosophy and the adyton of law conceptually compatible. Therefore, law approaches philosophy through an initiatic framework in which a hidden element (adyton) is emphasized.

Also important is Psellos' acknowledgment that Egyptian culture possesses hidden aspects. I emphasize the reference to the dark and inaccessible σύριγγες, an implication that the Egyptians also have some obscure culture, which Psellos also invokes elsewhere⁵⁷. Of course, this obscure character of Egyptian wisdom requires philosophical interpretation to render it intelligible.

57. References to Egyptian galleries are also attested in Theol. 1.79.131-132. Psellos, as stated in the critical apparatus, is based on a passage of Synesius' Τῷ ἀδελφῷ, ed. A. GARZYA, Synésios de Cyrène, Correspondance, vol. 3: Lettres LXIV-CLVI [Collection des universités de France 397.3], Paris 2000², Ep. 104.109. I have some reservations, since Synesius does not mention the Nile; therefore, the most likely source is the mentioned passage of Pausanias. Psellos states in the epilogue of his interpretation that if his solution is not considered successful, it must be hidden in the Egyptians' σύριγγες, where it will be covered by deep darkness. Here again, therefore, the σύριγγες are presented as part of an inferior culture, while the secret element is emphasized.

Egypt was regarded as a land of wisdom, occult knowledge, and magic in the ancient world. Pythagoras and Plato traveled to Egypt to study under Egyptian priests⁵⁸. Neoplatonic philosophers, who largely constitute the philosophical background of Psellos, attached particular importance to Egyptian theology and culture. The latter provided a foundation for justifying and conceptualizing theurgy in relation to Greek philosophy, as seen in Iamblichus⁵⁹. Proclus also traveled to Egypt to undergo initiation into Egyptian rituals⁶⁰. Plotinus highlights key characteristics of Egyptian wisdom, particularly its secrecy and symbolic discourse⁶¹. A similar perspective is evident in Psellos' writings⁶². Thus, secrecy within an initiatory and telestic framework is a recurring element in ancient philosophy and in Psellos' favorable consideration of Egyptian theology. This secret dimension of the ancient mystery cults forms the common denominator between Egyptian culture, law, and philosophy⁶³.

63. It is also possible that Psellos is here making a pun on the word Stoa, i.e. Stoic

Therefore, this aspect of Egyptian culture has a distinct importance, although in Psellos' example it seems unbridgeable in relation to the hidden teachings of jurisprudential philosophy. These references serve to highlight the secret element in a mystical context, which exists in all fields of human action, even in the art of innkeeping⁶⁴. Indeed, the reference to the σύριγγες is part of a wider association of Egyptian hidden culture with the Chaldean Oracles, a text of ancient mystical literature. In fact, this connection is ascertained in other works of Psellos⁶⁵. The ultimate aim is to highlight the Chaldean Oracles, while Egyptian culture –and through it, the art of the innkeeper– can act as introductory images of the wisdom of the Chaldean Oracles. As demonstrated in the following arguments by Psellos, the Chaldean Oracles play a significant role in legal education: they illustrate that law possesses mysteries of theology.

Adyta and the Hierurgy of καπηλεία and Jurisprudence

The reference to a hidden space in a mysteric context relates not only to law and philosophy but also to καπηλεία through the metaphor of the Egyptian σύριγγες. In fact, we find that Psellos refers to the art of tavern keepers, explicitly using the same mysteric terminology, although ironically. He says that the father of the judge did not allow him to immediately enter into the sanctuaries and adyta of the καπηλεία, that is, the transformation of the wine's substance and the mixing of the liquids⁶⁶. However, when he philosophy, which literally means gallery and the galleries of the Egyptians. This reinforces the hypothesis that Stoicism, as the Egyptian culture, also fits into a secret frame of reference.

In Τῷ μαγίστρῳ τῷ Ψηφᾷ, Ep. 284.30-33, he argues that he alone investigated both subjects accurately. Perhaps his references to the secret character of the Egyptian culture are also based on Iamblichus' Περὶ τῶν αἰγυπτίων μυστηρίων, which Psellos uses elsewhere, see e.g. <Τῷ μεγάλῳ δρογγαγρίῳ κῆρ Κωνσταντίνῳ, τῷ ἀνεψιῷ τοῦ πατριάρχου Μιχαήλ>, Ep. 125.23-29; <Τῷ καίσαρι Ἰωάννῃ τῷ Δούκῃ>, Ep. 53.20-24; Ep. 202.146-148 and the critical apparatus.

was about to celebrate (ιερουργεῖν) the laws, he immediately became a torchbearer (δαδοῦχος)⁶⁷ and proceeded without deviation to the *adyta*⁶⁸. The reference, although ironic, is important because it shows that in Psellos' thought the concept of adyton does not only concern law and philosophy but also extends to every aspect of human action. It is characteristic that he uses the crucial term ἄδυτον for both cases. Moreover, he likens engaging with the καπηλεία and the laws to a hierurgy⁶⁹, while he introduces concepts from the ancient Greek mysteries, such as torch bearing (δαδουχία).

Here too, the ritual references, although ironic, function as an introduction to the hieratic conception of jurisprudence⁷⁰. From this point onward, Psellos analyzes the telestics of jurisprudence.

3. The Mystic Consideration of Jurisprudence

72. According to *LSJ*⁹, entry προμυέω, the verb means "initiate beforehand".

προτελεσθείς⁷³, which, once again, belong to ritual language⁷⁴. He therefore parallels the stages of study in jurisprudence with the grades of initiation in ancient ritual⁷⁵. Particularly significant is his reference to an adyton as the highest level and the unhindered entry of an uninitiated person into it as problematic⁷⁶.

He then presents the curriculum of Plato's philosophical school, even though he is referring to law, as an example of the need for gradual initiation. According to this, Plato did not permit his students to progress immediately to theology without first studying ethics, followed by natural philosophy, and then mathematics together with dialectic⁷⁷. In these references, Plato appears as a hierophant who opens wide the entrances to science⁷⁸.

73. According to *LSJ*⁹, entry, προτελέω, the verb means “initiate or instruct beforehand”; in Pass.: “to be prepared for the mysteries”; similarly, l. c., ἱερὰ προτέλεια means “sacrifice offered before any solemnity,” among them also before the Eleusinian Mysteries. Προτέλειος is also something or the tax that takes place before an initiation's ceremony; metaphorically it also means the introduction to philosophy. It is possible that Psellos uses the term in a philosophical sense too, as it occurs in Proclus, Τὼν εἰς τὸν Παρμενίδην τοῦ Πλάτωνος ἐπτὰ βιβλίων, ed. C. STEEL, Procli in Platonis Parmenidem Commentaria, vol. 1, Oxford 2009, 1, p. 704.16, whom he often invokes. Furthermore, this meaning echoes Psellos' essential positions, in which ritual is linked to philosophy. See also DIAMANTOPOULOS, Η ερμηνευτική, 339, note 803. For the term in Psellos' hermeneutics (Theol. 1.70) see ib., 339-341.

74. Or. min. 14.51-55, especially 51-52: οὔτε τὴν τῶν νόμων ἀρχαιολογίαν προμνηθεῖς οὔτε τὴν τοῦ Δωδεκαδέλτου σοφίαν προτελεσθείς. At the top of the curriculum, he places the Digesta (Πανδέκτην) and the Codex (τοὺς Κώδικας). This constitutes a testimony to the structure of legal studies in the eleventh century, which until now has not been discussed.

75. In Psellos' writings, we frequently encounter the idea that knowledge must be acquired gradually, a concept linked to his understanding of human perfection. Indeed, even in letters to monks or those pursuing a monastic life, he criticizes forms of spirituality that surpass the intermediate stages of the soul's journey toward perfection, see Τῷ μοναχῷ Συμεῶν τῷ Κεγχρῇ, Ep. 100.58-63 with E. DELLI – D. J. O'MEARA, L'ascension mystique néoplatonicienne chez Michel Psellos, Φιλοσοφία 52 (2022 [2024]), 209-219, especially 214, note 16.

Littlewood notes in the critical apparatus with reference to Psellos' *Chronography*⁷⁹ that the latter wrongly attributes this curriculum to Plato. Moreover, as the same apparatus points out, the teaching about the stages of philosophical studies with the ultimate goal of theology is found in the Commentaries (in the prolegomena) to Aristotle's Categoriae of the Alexandrian Neoplatonists⁸⁰. It is interesting that only in the Prolegomena of Elias (or David) does the ritual terminology appear, namely the term *προτέλεια*⁸¹, which Psellos also employs in his present work.

Psellos is thus clearly aware of the Neoplatonic origins of the curriculum, as he himself claims to have studied Neoplatonism in depth⁸². I believe that he is ultimately presenting himself as both a student and a teacher, since he himself has followed a similar program of study on his own initiative, rather through any school curriculum, as he states in the aforementioned passage of the *Chronography*⁸³. He also assigns similar ritual designations to the stages of the philosophical program he taught⁸⁴.

There, however, he refers only indirectly to a structure, which he himself followed after rhetoric (dialectic, natural philosophy and metaphysics). Moreover, he does not refer to Plato as the source of this structure, but presents it as a purely personal course, where the Neoplatonists were at the center, with Proclus at the top. D. R. REINSCH (transl.), Leben der byzantinischen Kaiser (976-1075): Chronographia: Griechisch-deutsch [Sammlung Tusculum], Berlin/München/Boston 2015, 824, note 48, notes in connection with Psellos' reference to his studies in this passage that it goes back to Aristotle (Τὼν μετὰ τὰ φυσικά, ed. See also Χρονογραφία, 6.39-40, where Psellos mentions his geometrical, musical, astronomical studies in the context of mathematical studies, as a precursor of higher studies, but also his studies in the secret rites of the Neoplatonics (theurgy) and in the Chaldean Oracles, as one highest degree of studies, constituting a universal science, together with REINSCH, Leben 824, notes 53 and 54.

He therefore associates the curriculum of law studies with that of philosophy. This is a clear tendency to philosophize the law, which we already found elsewhere in Or. min. 14⁸⁵. This is also evident in the title of one of his own legal writings⁸⁶. However, philosophy is assimilated to an initiatory process, as Psellos uses mystic language and cites the example of the degrees of philosophical studies as an explanation of the need to pass through the grades of ritual initiation.

Jurisprudence and Eleusinian/Mithraic Mysteries

Psellos then accuses the former tavern owner of transgressing the laws, which he compares to valleys, and then proceeding to the ἄβατον city, thus becoming a prophet and hierophant despite having come from the *trivia*⁸⁷

83. It is no coincidence that Littlewood too in the critical apparatus refers to the aforementioned Chronographia's passage, accepting that Psellos is indirectly making a self-reference. Psellos mentions the term προτέλεια for his own introductory studies in Encomium in matrem, 5.338.

84. See Χρονογραφία, 6.45, where Psellos referring to how he entered the imperial court narrates that his rhetorical skills were the προτέλεια for the emperor Constantinos IX, before the latter entered the adyton of Psellos' philosophy. That is, he uses ritual terminology, but also the concept of adyton to characterize his rhetorical and philosophical thinking, as stages of study that his listener must pass through. See also KALDELLIS, The Argument, 132-133.

87. It means a place frequented by soothsayers or by persons of dubious repute. But they were also places where Hekate was worshipped; see *LSJ*⁹, entry τρίοδος. The latter meaning could be seen as directly related to the basic ideas of Or. min. 14. Perhaps Psellos by showing indirect contempt for Hekate here is trying in an oblique way to fend off accusations against him for his positive reference to her in the same work below, and in his works more widely. Indeed, Psellos is aware of Hekate's connection to the Trivia, see Ἐκθεσις κεφαλαιώδης καὶ σύντομος τῶν παρὰ Χαλδαίοις δογμάτων, ed. D. J. O' MEARA, Michaelis Pselli Philosophica minora, vol. 2 [Bibliotheca scriptorum Graecorum et Romanorum Teubneriana], Leipzig 1989 and the pits⁸⁸. Here, the humble social origin of the addressee is emphasized. The reference to an ἄβατον –an inaccessible sanctuary like the adyton discussed earlier– is important and concerns jurisprudence⁸⁹. The science of law is now directly combined with the concept of the hierophant, who dwells in a sacred space. It even seems that his position lies beyond jurisprudence, located in the valleys, while he himself is in the city. Thus, correct conduct– that is, progressing through all stages of philosophical and legal education, as outlined in Plato’s school curriculum–culminates in the philosopher’s transformation into a hierophant.

Psellos then refers again with irony to the former status of the judge: “And before you had even washed your hands from the water of your kettle, you dared to touch the sacred books”⁹⁰. Here too an initiatic language prevails, which forbids the uninitiated to touch the books of law, which Psellos characterizes as sacred⁹¹. Jurisprudence, therefore, entails not only gradual initiation, adyton, and the hierophant, but also sacred books that are inaccessible to the uninitiated. Also mocking his action, he uses a proverb spoken against the uneducated⁹². In this sense, it becomes clearer that when speaking of initiation, Psellos means the gradual education of the initiate in philosophy rather than a religious-type process. Nevertheless, the ritual dimension carries an essential symbolic meaning, because it is connected to the deeper existential meaning that Psellos attributes to the concept of the relationship between philosophy and jurisprudence, especially in how he understands the process of legal education.

Psellos later refers more clearly to the relationship between jurisprudence and the Eleusinian Mysteries. He criticizes the former tavern keeper by noting that no one dared to participate in the Mysteries of the Greeks without having been introduced to the preliminary offerings (προτέλεια) of the Mithraic ceremony⁹³, while in the Eleusinian Mysteries those who participated in the ceremony were bound by law of secrecy⁹⁴. He therefore again uses the terminology of the grades of initiation into the pagan mysteries, as well as the principle of concealment, to describe the degrees of study in law, here expressly in the context of the Eleusinian Mysteries or Mithraism. Previously, Plato's school of philosophy functioned as an example; now, ancient Greek initiation is featured. This demonstrates how closely connected Psellos considered the two categories to be.

Furthermore, Psellos places the Eleusinian Mysteries and the Mithraic ritual in the same category as pagan mysteries⁹⁵. The two ceremonies are not identical, but the cult of Mithras is similar to the Eleusinian Mysteries. The Mithraic religion was mainly sacramental and included adyton and seven grades of initiation. The initiates performed the mysteries in caves, which were called *mithraea*⁹⁶. The Neoplatonist Porphyry in his work De antro Nympharum, which allegorizes the story of the cave of the Nymphs in the *Odyssey*⁹⁷, gives extensive information about the worship of Mithras in the caves⁹⁸. The choice of Psellos to deal in one of his writings (Phil. min. 1.45) with the interpretation of Odyssey's Nymphs' cave, where he quotes almost verbatim the mentioned allegoresis of Porphyry, must be highlighted here. It confirms that the Mithraic caves and the mystagogic rites that took place in them have a special significance for Psellos, although he himself does not explicitly refer to the *mithraea*⁹⁹. Psellos utilizes the elements of initiation from these ancient ceremonies in combination with the secrecy of the sanctuary in order to highlight the particular importance that the process of acquiring scientific knowledge possesses for him, as I will show below. I should also note that the Mithraic ritual initiation is generally a source of inspiration for his own writings and is often associated with the Eleusinian Mysteries¹⁰⁰. In this context, the hierophant is presented as a fundamental concept, since Psellos consciously includes him in the cults of other religions (Mithraism), and in fact gives him a supreme role¹⁰¹.

99. In Phil. min. 1.45 Psellos does not deal with the Porphyry's passages that give information about the mithraea.

100. To Mithras, in the context of the Eleusinian Mysteries, Psellos refers also in Theol. 1.70.9-11. He emphasizes that during the initiation process the initiate was purified. In Τῷ μεγάλῳ δρογγαρίῳ κῦρ Κωνσταντίνῳ, Ep. 122.22-25 he refers to the trials and punishments of the Mithraic Mysteries, even comparing them to the initiation of the Eleusinian Mysteries.

The Eleusinian Mysteries per se also constitute a key point of reference more widely in Psellos' forensic didactic theory and practice¹⁰². In his his Funeral Oration for Patriarch Xiphilinos, he extols the Patriarch for teaching the emperor Constantine IX Monomachos (1042-1055) jurisprudence mystagogically as if he were performing the Eleusinian Mysteries¹⁰³. Psellos also uses terms of Eleusinian initiation in the titles and in the text of his own law books¹⁰⁴. Moreover, in Or. fun. 9 he refers to the belief of the person being praised (Romanos referendarios) that rhetorical education was sufficient for access to the science of law. This led him to apply rhetorical rules when adjudicating cases. However, Psellos emphasizes that if one progresses from basic jurisprudential knowledge to the mysteries

101. See Τῷ Ἀριστηνῷ τῷ πρωτασηκρῆτις, Ep. 20.31-37, where the need for education in the science of grammar based on the grades of initiation of the Mithraic Mysteries is highlighted. There, Psellos also refers to the punishments foreseen during the initiation. The pinnacle of this is the grade of hierophant, who is located in the adyton. However, the Mithraic initiation culminated in the rank of Πατήρ (Father), which was a high-priestly rank, see CHALUPA, Grades, 188. Psellos mentions this grade in Or. for. 1.152-153. Therefore, in Ep. 20 too, as in Or. min. 14, Psellos insists on the use of the term hierophant, although he knows that it was not prescribed in the Mithraic Mysteries. See also the critical apparatus of Ep. 20. For similar thoughts of discovering hidden philosophical meanings while teaching grammar in the context of a ritual, see also Ἐπιτάφιος εἰς Νικήταν μαῖιστωρα τῆς σχολῆς τοῦ ἁγίου Πέτρου, Or. fun. 4.6.5-27. Therefore, one can find out that the ritual consideration also extends to the studies of grammar. This proves its importance in the thought of Psellos, as it covers many objects of education.

102. For Psellos as a law teacher, see Z. CHITWOOD, Byzantine Legal Culture and the Roman Legal Tradition, 867-1056, Cambridge 2017, 178-181, where also the previous bibliography is mentioned.

of philosophy, he will become perfect¹⁰⁵. In this context, he uses telestic terminology of interpretation, pointing out the danger of an approach from a philosophically uninitiated person who is unable to discern the depth of hidden meanings¹⁰⁶.

Therefore, Psellos has fully integrated the ritual concepts into his own teaching program of law, which are projected as a model in the person of Xiphilinos. However, these concepts, as it will turn out, also constitute the fundamental core of his hermeneutical thinking.

This analysis confirms that the Mithraic and Eleusinian Mysteries held special significance for Psellos, shaping his conception of knowledge. Specifically, these traditions illuminate Psellos' perspective on legal education, which he envisions as a lived experience structured in stages. At the culmination of this process, the student acquires a new way of being and acting. This view contrasts with the notion of legal education as the mere assimilation of abstract knowledge. Rather, it is a transformative process akin to initiation into mystery cults, ultimately conferring upon the initiate a new, almost "divinized" status. In this framework, the hierophant serves as the ultimate symbol of perfected existence, revealing through interpretation the mystery of knowledge¹⁰⁷.

Here Psellos uses the term προτέλεια to refer to introductory studies in jurisprudence.

107. In Theol. 1.19.70-80, Psellos states that when he identifies a rhetorical theme of great value in interpreting the words of St. Gregory the Theologian, he becomes "possessed" (ἐνθουσιῶ κατὰ τοὺς κατόχους); that is, he resembles the ancient enthusiasts who gave oracles, were possessed by spirits, or had mystical inspiration. Consequently, he explains these important themes to those who approach him, apparently also to his students, experiencing an alteration (τὴν θεῖαν ἀλλοιοῦμαι ἀλλοίωσιν, καὶ ἀνθ' οὗ νῦν εἰμι, καλλίων τὴν φύσιν γίγνομαι). Therefore, says Psellos, he resembles the Pythia who suffered something similar when she gave oracles; see also Theol. 2.1.17-21 where the Byzantine philosopher presents himself as a hierophant who lifts the curtains, transforms himself and becomes θεόληπτος, that is, possessed by a divine inspiration, see *LSJ*⁹, entry θεόληπτος. He even wishes that the recipient of his work, Michael Doukas, would experience a similar experience. See my

Jurisprudence and the Chaldean Oracles

Psellos presents in Or. min. 14 a further level of mysticism. According to him, while the ancient mysteries contained the concept of gradual initiation and the demand for secrecy, which is something easy, this man, showed such great courage when attempting to philosophize with the Muses and legislate with the wise and judge with the rulers, that he immediately wiped his hands of the materials of the innkeeper's art and engaged in legal matters¹⁰⁸. Here, the argument of the forbidden entry into another genre is repeated and the coupling of rhetoric (Muses) and law with philosophy (φιλοσοφείν) is ascertained.

Furthermore, Psellos uses the phrase οὐρανίας ἄντυγος to refer to jurisprudence. Ἄντυξ means the edge of a circular thing. In the field of astronomy, it denotes the orbit of a planet, the circle of the world, as well as the celestial dome¹⁰⁹, indeed in the context of the *Chaldean Oracles*¹¹⁰, as handed down by Proclus¹¹¹. So here too, legal science is associated with ancient mysticism, and now with the Chaldean Oracles. This ascertainment is important, since, as we will see in detail, Psellos explicitly refers to the Chaldean Oracles.

Indeed, he mentions the Chaldean Oracles at the culmination of his mystical arguments. He accuses the judge of having ignored so much that jurisprudence not only investigates the affairs of the city but also analysis of the two passages in Η ερμηνευτική, 322-323, 285-286. It is certain that these references also concern Psellos' thought on the relationship between law and philosophy, given that they too have a common point of reference of hermeneutics as an initiatic process.

has mysteries of theology and teaches about nature. In fact, in the end it abandons rhetoric, like Hekate abandons nature. He would have found the latter had he paid attention to the texts of the Chaldean Oracles, which he calls *λόγια*¹¹². Through this reference, the mentioned theology of Platonic philosophy is now connected with the Chaldean Oracles.

Hekate, who was associated with the Eleusinian Mysteries and considered one of their main deities¹¹³, often appears in the *Chaldean Oracles*¹¹⁴. She was particularly worshiped by the Neoplatonists (among others she was a goddess of theurgy)¹¹⁵. In the Chaldean Oracles she represented life, the cosmic soul, nature, and destiny (εἰμαρμένη)¹¹⁶.

What exactly is her relationship with nature? Psellos refers to the subject in Phil. min. 2.40¹¹⁷. There he describes the springs symbolically found on the statue of Hekate and teaches that nature is the end of the girdle's springs¹¹⁸ floating on her back. This passage is correlated in the research with fragment 54 of the Chaldean Oracles, which teaches that abundant nature is suspended from the back of Hekate¹¹⁹. Lewy points out that the moon is Hekate's abode. Therefore, she is a moon deity and rules over it¹²⁰. The Chaldean Hekate dwells in the moon while giving her oracles, in the context of theurgy. Lewy also notes that the term φύσις is used in the Chaldean Oracles (fr. 54, 101, 102) metonymically to represent the moon¹²¹. Therefore, on her back hung symbolically the disk of the moon, which is one of her most characteristic properties¹²². Hekate herself is also called *φύσις*¹²³, namely, ruler of the sensible world; therefore, according to the Chaldean Oracles the moon symbolized her rule over this world¹²⁴. Hekate is ultimately identified with nature according to Lewy, by which is meant the world of heavenly bodies too¹²⁵. Nature ensures that the heavenly bodies move according to their laws, based on necessity. She is also related to *εἰμαρμένη*¹²⁶. However, there is also the view that completely distinguishes nature from Hekate so that only the former dominates the material world and the problems the latter causes for the theurgist and the one who seeks salvation¹²⁷.

Therefore, Psellos, teaching about Hekate and φύσις in Or. min. 14, presupposes the Or. Chald. fr. 54¹²⁸. Rhetoric, Psellos' φύσις, is associated with the lower forms of existence, the heavenly bodies, and the dark material world¹²⁹. Yet he considers that Hekate leaves nature¹³⁰ and hence functions as a symbol that rhetoric is abandoned by the judge. According to Psellos' image, nature is therefore not identified with Hekate, as Lewy argues¹³¹.

Psellos teaches that jurisprudence contains teachings of natural philosophy (περὶ φύσεως φθέγγεται), a lower branch of philosophy, and also reaches theology. It is quite possible that he considers these teachings to be secret as well. However, they are considered the precursor of theology. Hekate's φύσις would then be the symbol not only of rhetoric, but of this natural philosophy too, contained in rhetorical studies. One could assume that through Hekate's image he is referring to the need to abandon the search for natural philosophy in the context of these studies, since these studies must also be abandoned by the jurist in order to investigate the mysteries from Hekate is based on the Middle Platonism's concept of the double cosmic soul, where the lower, irrational, deals with the sensible world, so that the superior soul remains intact with the latter. See ib., 136, note 11 for bibliography and sources regarding this teaching of Middle Platonism. In the Chaldean Oracles, therefore, Hekate appears divided. The image of nature hanging from Hekate is a symbol of this view. Johnston, in addition to fr. 54 is based on fr. 70, 88, 101, 102. See also below in this paper, note 130.

128. In the research on the Chaldean Oracles, especially on Hekate, the quoted passage of Or. min. 14 has not been discussed until now, although it is of particular importance in Psellos' argumentation and illuminates the teaching of the Chaldean Oracles.

129. For Hekate as the source of nature, with whom in the context of the existence of seven physical worlds the heavenly and material worlds are related, where negative characterizations are formulated for the latter, see Phil. min. 2.40, p. 149.19: Ἐκθεσις κεφαλαιώδης καὶ σύντομος τῶν παρ' Ἀσσυρίοις δογμάτων, Phil. min. 2.41, p. 152.4-8.

130. I have not been able to locate any passage in the Chaldean Oracles that directly testifies to this movement of Hekate. Certainly, Psellos adopts the traditional image of nature on Hekate's back, but he gives her another perspective. Perhaps he is based on the aforementioned Middle Platonic distinction of the cosmic soul into superior and inferior, on the basis of which in the Chaldean Oracles nature appears as a separate existence in relation to Hekate, where the former only deals with the earthly world, see JOHNSTON, Hekate Soteira, 138-142, especially, ib., 139: "Physis –previously the lower half of the Cosmic Soul– became a goddess, a sort of chthonic Hekate", also, ib., 142: "In effect, the traditional Hekate became two goddesses in the Chaldean system–the celestial Hekate/Soul and the earthly Physis".

of theology. Clearly, rhetoric and the mysteries of the visible world are considered a cover that prevents the emergence of the theological mysteries of jurisprudence. In fact, Hekate, Psellos' jurisprudence, leaves the world of heaven and matter. The image functions as a symbol of law studies, where one from the valley of laws ends up in the city of philosophy, and constitutes an indirect testimony to the structure of legal studies in Psellos' thought and his didactic praxis of law, which is of the eleventh century.

Psellos wonders whether the judge has read the *λόγια*¹³². He considers this a necessary condition for the completion of legal education, and through this for the correct interpretation of the laws too and not just a basis for the example he invokes. The proof of this lies not only the previous analysis of his sources, but also in the fact that he uses the teaching about Hekate as an essential interpretive tool elsewhere in his writings¹³³. Furthermore, he poses a hermeneutical issue in jurisprudence as well, as the hermeneutic act of searching for and uncovering physical and theological hidden meanings is required¹³⁴.

4. Conclusions

Psellos derives his mysteric view of philosophy from a longstanding philosophical tradition. However, there is also originality in his thought. Specifically, in Or. min. 14, the Byzantine philosopher draws upon fundamental elements of mystery cults, as they were incorporated into the philosophical tradition mentioned, particularly the themes of initiation and hierarchy, to establish theoretical foundations and concepts regarding legal training and jurisprudence. Thus, this is not merely a coupling of law and philosophy, a “philosophization” of jurisprudence, which is also evident in other works by Psellos, but a deeper correlation between law and the mysteries of the ancients. The integration of legal science and education into such a telestic framework aligns with Psellos’ mysteric approach to hermeneutics, in which the hierophant serves as the principal model.

Psellos presents as a model the mysteries of the ancients for jurisprudence, although he characterizes them as ceremonies of the pagans. He emphasizes the need for initiation into the science of law, as he does in his references disposition but he knows Hekate’s themes well); Ὁνειδίζει τοῦς μαθητὰς ἀμελοῦντας, Or. min. 24.84-85, where he encourages his disciples to reject the stories about Hekate, in fact about her springs. However, he places the dissuasion in the context of a larger argumentation (70-104) in which he advises his students to be selective about ancient philosophical and mystical literature, thus presupposing that they must know Hekate’s themes.

134. The same concept of discovering Chaldean philosophical truths through jurisprudence is promoted in Or. fun. 3.22.18-28. See discussion of these passages in WOLSKA-CONUS, L’école, 58-59. The researcher occasionally raised the question of initiation and not at all that of the hierophant in jurisprudence, although she briefly discussed the quoted passage of Or. fun. 3.10.49-51, where Psellos speaks of the Eleusinian Mysteries, but also Psellos’ writings mentioned in my note 104. Indeed, ib., 78 and notes 405-408, based on these writings she noted that the Byzantine philosopher presents a false unity of his legal works by presenting them as a gradual initiation of a religious sacramental type. Moreover, the author did not discuss the present Or. min. 14 and did not mention the hermeneutical dimension of the mentioned passages.

to philosophy¹³⁵. In fact, he highlights not only the Eleusinian but also the Mithraic Mysteries. Psellos emphasizes that no one can enter the adyton of legal knowledge uninitiated, thus introducing the concept of concealment. He believes that only the hierophant is allowed to enter. By this he means the scholar, as in philosophy, who reveals the mysteries to the initiated, implying himself¹³⁶.

Systematic and long-term pre-education is therefore an absolute prerequisite. This includes more than philosophy, however. Indeed, Psellos, in speaking about the mysteries of theology revealed to the judge, presupposes the secret teachings of the Chaldean Oracles, particularly their references to Hekate¹³⁷. The image of nature on the back of Hekate, invoked by Psellos, is connected with the cosmology of the heavenly bodies and with the dominance of Hekate in the world of the senses. This symbol is also related to interpretation, as reference is made to oracles, given by Hekate against her stay on the moon in the context of Neoplatonic mysticism (theurgy). The image serves as a symbol of the need for the law student to transcend rhetoric and move into philosophy. Therefore, the knowledge of the Chaldean Oracles is presented as being essential. Hence, the philosophical view of [Oxford studies in Byzantium], Oxford 2017, 143-445, at 319-320, where Psellos, recognizing the value of one of his students, declares using telestic language that he will initiate him, while his student will be the leader of the other students by initiating them; Psellos also possesses secret knowledge in the context of the Eleusinian Mysteries; revelations will take place, when he introduces the student to the adyton: Ἐπεὶ τοιγαροῦν [...] φιλόσοφον τὴν ἀπόκρισιν δέδωκας, οὐ τοῖς ἐμοῖς θιασώταις μόνον συναριθμῶ, ἀλλὰ καὶ προαριθμῶ καὶ προτίθημι καὶ τοῦ χοροῦ κορυφαῖόν σε τίθημι, ἵν' αὐτὸς ἐξ ἐμοῦ πρῶτος μνῆ, οἱ δ' ἄλλοι τελῶνται παρὰ σοῦ, καὶ διὰ σοῦ μέσου οὐ τὰ τῶν Ἐλευσίνων μοι ἀπόρητα δέχωνται, ἀλλὰ τὰ ἡμέτερα θεοφάνια [...]. Δεῦρο γοῦν στήθι πλησίον ἐμοῦ; μνήσομαι γάρ σοι ἴσως τὰ τελεώτερα καὶ εἰς τὰ κεκρυμμένα τῆς ἐπιστήμης εἰσάξω, [...] Ἐγὼ δέ σοι οὐκ ἀνακαλύψω νῦν τὰ μυστήρια, ἀλλ' ὅταν ἐντὸς τῶν ἀδύτων γενώμεθα.

137. According to LEWY, Chaldean Oracles, 444 (Excursus I) by the term θεολόγοι, the Neoplatonists refer to either the Chaldean Oracles or the Orphics.

jurisprudence presents two main aspects, one secret in a telestic context, related to the Eleusinian and Mithraic Mysteries and one rather mystical, leading to the experience of union with ultimate realities, dependent on the Chaldean Oracles. However, in both cases hidden truths are revealed.

Law now appears to be very close to philosophy. However, their common denominator is the hierophant's symbol. The philosophization of jurisprudence and rhetoric is understood through a program where one gradually abandons these sciences to move into secret knowledge as a hierophant. When Psellos speaks of the need to go through all the stages of initiation, he means the gradual ending in hermeneutics, which is understood as the revelation of secrets. In fact, every field of science, every social class, and every culture displays hidden worlds suitable for revelations. They uncover great philosophical meanings or function as images of higher forms of thought. This requires having the right person for their investigation, the hierophant. The hierophant is the high priest of this philosophy.

Why is this hieratic dimension so important? The answer lies in the concept of the revelation of the hidden teachings, an essential feature of the ritual. Only revelation and hieratic hermeneutics, and not simply logic-controlled philosophy, reveal the true meaning of jurisprudence. By this Psellos means not a religious practice but the discovery of philosophical meanings even in texts that are not considered philosophical, such as grammar or legal texts. In this context, the knowledge of secret literature becomes necessary¹³⁸. This is also the true philosophy according to Psellos. In fact, the entrance into and the view of the adyton by only highly initiated persons, guided by the hierophant, have an equally great importance in this hermeneutical context, in relation to the confrontations of Psellos' time. The entrance and the view to the sanctuary of the church temple was a key point of confrontation between the mystical theologians and the school of Psellos. I considered that the choice of the symbol of the hierophant did not only theoretically and abstractly serve to promote hermeneutics. At the same time, it functioned as a counterweight to the canonical invocation of the mystics (Stethatos) of the permitted entry and view of the sanctuary for the clergy only, which the mystics exploited symbolically. The clergy, through the entrance to the sanctuary, symbolized for Stethatos the theological method, which, beginning with ascesis, culminated in the view of mysteries in a secret adyton. Therefore, the philosophical method was rejected for such a purpose. Psellos opposes the layman philosopher who enters the philosophical sanctuary as a hierophant and discovers the mysteries of philosophical theology¹³⁹.

138. The following passage briefly shows the inseparable relationship of philosophy with mysticism, indeed with the Chaldean Oracles, in Psellian thought, Ep. 134.19-24: Τοιοῦτον γὰρ τὸ φιλόσοφον χρῆμα: ἢ ἐχέμυθον πάντη καὶ μυστηριώδες, ἢ συμβολικὸν καὶ ὑπὸ φαύλοις παραπετάσμασι τε καὶ σχήμασι τὰ τῆς σοφίας κρύπτον ἀπόρρητα. Διὰ ταῦτα τοῖς ἀρχαίοις φιλοσόφοις θεολογοῦσι, πατέρες, καὶ δυνάμεις, καὶ νοῖ, τριαδικαί τε ὕγγες, καὶ τελετάρχαι, καὶ κοσμοαγοὶ τῷ λόγῳ παρελαμβάνοντο. Philosophy always has a secret character in a mysteric context, which is why the Neoplatonists used the polyarchy of the Chaldean Oracles as a cover of mysteries; for this polyarchy see Phil. min. 2.39; 2.40; 2.41; Theol. 1.23.33-55; 1.51.84-95. Therefore, interpretative revelation becomes necessary. The same applies to jurisprudence, which is also presented as part of philosophy.

This process shows that the concept of the hierophant and the ritual grades of initiation related to him are not merely a metaphor, in order to highlight the need for pre-education in law and philosophy¹⁴⁰. They highlight specific epistemic qualities that the process of acquiring knowledge must possess, qualities that extend beyond the mere assimilation of abstract concepts. The hierophant is an essential philosophical symbol because it serves to promote hermeneutics as the philosophy par excellence, which I consider to be the basic philosophical position of the Byzantine philosopher.
