COMMERCIAL ACTIVITIES OF KORAÏS IN AMSTERDAM

Preface

Several years ago, while helping a colleague to classify the archives of the Dutch embassy in Turkey, I discovered between those papers a sizeable archive of a Greek merchant, Dimitrios Kourmoulis, who had been established in Venice and later in Amsterdam. Kourmoulis was a friend of Koraïs, but had never drawn the attention of Greek historians and a few words, published in a letter of Koraïs, have remained unnoticed: «La mort du pauvre Cormuli m'a vivement affecté. Quoique je n'aie point l'honneur de connoître sa veuve, faites lui sentir, je vous prie, la part que je prends à son malheur et mes regrets pour la perte d'un ami que j'estimois infiniment». In fact there is some resemblance in the bad luck they had as merchants. Both Kourmoulis and Koraïs had troubles with their Smyrna partners; in the case of Kourmoulis it went so far that he was even murdered by his partner.

Putting the papers of Kourmoulis into some order I soon found a number of letters written by Koraïs to Kourmoulis during the years 1773-1776. Thanks to the help and encouragement of Miss Maria Mantouvalou I was able to find in Kourmoulis' archive many other documents referring to Koraïs and to begin an analysis of these primarily commercial documents. Also in other Dutch archives (the consulate of Smyrna, the notaries of the city of Amsterdam and the Dutch East India Company) I found traces of the business activities of Koraïs. All this material put together might give an interesting supplement to the existing material on Koraïs' Amsterdam period and enable us to make a quantitative and qualitative appreciation of Koraïs as a merchant in Amsterlife of this period which should serve as a supplement to what Iliou has written in his excellent introduction to the letters of Korais' clerk Stamati Petro.

A. Some general remarks on the place of the Greek merchants in Dutch Levant trade

a. Traders

The most important part of the activities of Diamant Coray & Co consisted in direct trade between Holland and the principal ports of the Ottoman Empire, Smyrna and Constantinople. Essentially this trade was an exchange of European and colonial products against Levantine products. The Levantine products, amongst which crude and spun cotton were the most important, were of vital necessity to the European textile industry, and the quick expansion of Dutch Smyrna trade in the 1770's stands into direct connection with the industrial expansion of Western Europe².

Originally the trade between Holland and Turkey was entirely dominated by the merchants of a few big Dutch towns assisted by small colonies of Dutch merchants in Smyrna and Constantinople. The Dutch merchants in Smyrna bought the European products from relations in Holland and sold them to dealers in the bazars, while they bought from the same dealers cotton and other Levantine products. Trade between France or England and Turkey went according to British and French law exclusively through the intermediary of British or French merchants who were established in Turkey, but trade with Holland, Italy and Austria could pass without such obligatory mediation. In this dam.¹ I have joined some notes on the private and intellectual

2. There exists no comprehensive study on the Dutch Levant trade, but there is an extensive anthology of the Dutch sources in the Bronnen tot de geschiedenis van de Levantse handel, of which the volumes 4/1 and 4/2 (edited by J. G. Nanninga, 's-Gravenhage 1964-1966) cover Korais' period in Amsterdam. The expansion of Dutch Smyrna trade can be seen in the consular accounts of Smyrna, Algemeen Rijksarchief of the Hague (further cited as A.R.A.), Archives of the consulate in Smyrna, series dd.

way Greek firms could export directly to Holland without the intervention of the Dutch firms of Smyrna and Constantinople. In the 18th century we also find Greek merchants established in Holland, foreigners being entirely free to establish themselves there as merchants. Some of these Greeks even fulfilled the formalities to become citizens of Amsterdam and in this way they became legally Dutch subjects. Korais also became a citizen of Amsterdam in 1774³.

In order to avoid overheads the Levant merchants tended to form kinds of trusts, getting control of the entire circulation of the merchandise, from raw material to manufacturing, transporting, importing and retailing. In this way the great firms held offices in Holland and in the Levant, took a hand into the production of Dutch woollen cloth, exported it to the Levant on chartered vessels to their business partner in Turkey. The business partners in Turkey often acted as moneylenders to village communities in Turkey and so were involved in the local cotton production for the payment of their loans.

Especially some Greek firms, who had a narrow link between their chief office in Smyrna and a «daughter company» in Amsterdam, were very active in such attempts at concentration. In this way they were able to cut overheads, lower prices and undercut their competitors⁴.

Money-lending to village-communities with the tax-revenues in natura as a security is a very ancient practice in the Aegean trade, cf. K. D. Mertzijs, «Μία διαθήκη ἐκ Σίφνου», Ἐπετηρὶς τοῦ Ἀρχαίου τοῦ Ἱστορίας τοῦ Ἑλληνικοῦ Δικαίου 8 (1958) 103-111.

As practical examples we will now give some details on the structure of three different business houses which were engaged in the trade between Turkey and Holland. We are able to do so because parts of the archives of all three firms have survived.

a. David van Lennep & Willem Enslië (Φανλενεπ in Korais' orthography) was a large Dutch firm, established in Smyrna. In Korais' time there were three large Dutch firms in Smyrna who together controlled almost half of the entire trade between Holland and Smyrna. The other half was divided among one very great, five considerable and a large number of small native firms, most of them Greek. From the surviving papers of Van Lennep we get an image of a wide-spread activity. Their trade with Holland had a yearly turnover of a million or more guilders; they had also considerable trade with Livorno, Venice and Marseilles. The firm had its own agents in central Anatolia where Turkish products were bought. Van Lennep did also much banking business; the firm was developing into one of the most important merchant-bankers in the Levant. The directors of the firm, both liberal Calvinists, belonged to the ruling aristocratic families of Amsterdam. Their social prestige was very high. Korais knew Van Lennep personally, since the Swiss Dentand, who was the home-teacher of Van Lennep's children, was a close friend of Korais. Regarding Van Lennep's partner William Enslië we have the catalogue of his library, which shows him to be an educated person with an interest in the literature and thought of his time⁵.

b. Thomas de Vogel & Co was a medium-sized Dutch firm in Amsterdam during the years 1750-1770. He had relations with Greek firms in Turkey. Another member of the De Vogel family had a large business firm in Smyrna. De Vogel did not only trade with Smyrna, but also with the Caribbean and with the Baltic. He had his own ships. In its trade the Amsterdam firm was careful and conservative, and its letters contain some interesting remarks on the way Greek merchants in Amsterdam conducted their trade. The Smyrna firm was taken over in 1777 by one of its partners, Esaie Fercken, whom we know through Koraïs' correspondence. It became the largest Dutch firm in Smyrna and in its office Koraïs' brother was employed⁶.

c. Joannis Avgerinos. The Dutch firms of Turkey and Amsterdam usually were independent of each other, even if they had joint ventures in some cases. The Greeks usually worked with large networks of firms in Europe and in Turkey, which seemed independent but which were in reality daughters of one big company. The only Greek firm of that time which has left enough documents to enable us to know the details of its structure is the firm of Avgerinos. In its definitive form, which it took in 1778, it was a society of 7 partners, all Chians, of whom 4 took an active part in business as heads of the firms established in Smyrna, Amsterdam, Trieste and Constantinople under their own names. In 1773-1776, when this society had relations with Koraïs, there were three establishments: in Smyrna under Joannis Avgerinos, in Constantinople under Loukas Kalvokoressis and in Venice under Dimitrios Kourmoulis. Kourmoulis was a personal friend of Koraïs and had learnt Dutch in Amsterdam, where he had been a clerk in the office of Thomas & d'Isay. In the archives of Kourmoulis there are some 50 documents on Koraïs: correspondence of Kourmoulis with his partners referring to Koraïs, correspondence with Koraïs himself and accounts.

The structure and way of doing business of this firm are known in detail from its archive, which may serve as an example of how Greek business firms, like the one Koraïs joined, operated. Formally the offices in Venice, Smyrna and Constantinople were independent business ventures, but in reality the Smyrna partner was leading the operations and the results of other offices were yearly entered into a central account.

The society of Avgerinos, Kalvokoressis and Kourmoulis was of medium size. When it was at its zenith, in 1779-1780, its annual turnover reached a value of 500,000 guilders, of which approximately 3/4 was trade with Holland. We might estimate that the Korais-Stathi Thomas combination of 1773 had approximately the same size⁷.

b. Merchandise, insurance, ways of payment and profits.

The business of an Amsterdam office of a Greek merchant society mainly consisted in buying as cheaply as possible European merchandise of the kind which would find a ready market in the Levant, and selling as quickly and as expensively as possible the Levantine merchandise his partners in Constantinople, Smyrna or Chios were sending to him⁸.

The most important of European merchandise was heavy European woollen cloth. This cloth was made by a very difficult, laborious and expensive process in small factories all over Europe. The Greek merchants bought Dutch woollen cloth from producers in the Southern border region of the Dutch republic and from some Dutch cities which bought German woollen cloth (Lipsikanika) from Bohemia, Saxony and Silezia. This cloth usually went to Turkey in parcels containing some 300 meters of cloth in 10 to 15 pieces, dyed in different clear colours. A parcel mostly contained pieces of green, turquoise, bright blue, violet, crimson, lead grey and brown. Such a parcel would cost at the Amsterdam Exchange about 4500 guilders. This high price is not remarkable if we consider that each piece of 30 meters contained about 40 kilos of wool and was dyed with expensive colorants. The Greek merchant bought this cloth through the mediation of Dutch merchants who were often also producers in the large cities of Holland. These Dutch merchants also sent cloth to Turkey for their own account; in such cases the Greek merchants of Amsterdam often acted as brokers for a commission of 1-2%⁹.

A difficulty in the trade of woollen cloth was that in the course of the intricate production process mistakes were easily made which could cause blemishes of the colour or irregular shrinking. The merchants avoided opening the parcels (which had anyway been inspected and sealed with leaden seals by a special board of control), in order to avoid the occurrence of false folds in the expensive cloth. Defective manufacturing was often discovered upon sale by the retailer in the bazar in Smyrna, and this could lead to documents like these from which extracts are published here in appendix 2, nrs. 2, 3, 5, 13.

The other main products Koraïs and his colleagues bought in Amsterdam did not come from Holland, but from the Dutch colonies in Asia. Such products were sold at the big auctions of the Kompania, as Koraïs called the Dutch East India Company¹⁰. Among the colonial merchandise were spices like pepper, cinnamom, cloves and nutmeg, which came from Dutch colonies in Indonesia, India and Sri Lanka, and also cotton cloth, called panikà by the Greek merchants, which came from Dutch colonial establishments in Bangla Desh and India. Especially after 1770 the panikà became very important in the Dutch Levant trade; this evolution seems to be related with the decline of the interior trade of the Ottoman Empire (formerly Indian cotton cloth had been imported into Smyrna through interior Asiatic trade by Armenian merchants) and also with the decline in the manufacturing of cotton cloth in Turkey¹¹. These panikà consisting of thin tissues and cotton muslins, especially the cheaper kinds, were sold in Smyrna. In international trade they were called by their Indian names: cassa (turco-greek: χασέ), seersucker (in turco-greek μουσαπετχάνια, but Koraïs, disliking Turkish words, writes in his letters about seersuckers) and mulmul (turco-greek μερμερ, Korais uses a greicisation of the dutch word malmolens: μαλμολενς).

The principal articles of exportation from the Levant were crude cotton, red or white spun cotton and angora wool. These were sold through the mediation of brokers in Amsterdam to Dutch or foreign textile factories. Stamati Petro correspondence contains in a rather corrupted form the names of several of these brokers in Levantine merchandise¹².

In order to spread the risks, large part of the business was done by shared participation. In this manner a parcel of cloth was not sent from Holland to Smyrna for the account and risk of one merchant alone, but shares in the parcel would be sold to one or more other merchants who would later also share the profits or losses. Also the Greek merchants of Amsterdam did considerable business as agents for merchants other than their own partners. For this work they got the ordinary commission, and this could yield them a considerable income¹³.

An official Greek insurance company was only founded at the end of the 18th century, but already from 1770 on we find in our papers Greek merchants as underwriters on ships and cargoes. Dimitrios Kourmoulis held an insurance business in Venice together with some other Greek merchants. Korais also is referred to as doing business as an insurer¹⁴.

In the course of the Turkish-Russian war of 1769-1774 the Russians in the Aegean began to confiscate merchandise on neutral ships that belonged to Ottoman Greeks. The risks of insuring Greek merchandise then became too great for the small Greek insurers. They then began to re-insure current policies with European firms, while they did not underwrite new ones. For several years most Greeks did not underwrite themselves any more policies, but they kept on acting as insurance brokers, the Greeks of Amsterdam obtaining policies from Dutch underwriters for cargoes belonging to Smyrna Greeks¹⁵.

In most studies on the history of the Levant trade during the time of Koraïs we find the remark that the largest part of the trade was done by barter, called «troc». Nevertheless from the archives of the three contemporary merchants we have used we saw that in the 1770's troc had become rare and that most payments were made in bills of exchange¹⁶. The advantage of payment in bills over barter was that it was easier to consider if any business operation was lucrative or not; barter tends to hide losses. A disadvantage of payment in bills were the costs involved in the traffic of bills of exchange, but part of these costs could be compensated by judicious speculation. Greek merchants became very busy speculating on the international values market, and in the time of Koraïs they were well acquainted with all the intricacies of the use of bills of exchange¹⁷. The opinion of Svoronos that there was more ready money available to merchants in Turkey during the second half of the 18th century than before, owing to the appearance of bills of exchange seems not to be correct. Bills of exchange were already in frequent use during the 17th century. In the second half of the 18th century we often come across scarcity of means of payment in the Levant because local investors tended to divert money they earned in trade to the consumptive sector, where higher interest rates could be obtained. This caused a chronic lack of liquid means for financing business in Turkey¹⁸.

In an earlier study about Dimitrios Kourmoulis we have shown that the profits in the Levant trade were not as extravagantly high as has been supposed. In Kourmoulis' trade we found an average profit of 5% on the total turnover. Notwithstanding this rather feeble percentage, profits on turnovers of many hundreds of thousands of guilders could provide a very considerable income. Koraïs could make a very good living and even some dolce vita in Amsterdam from his part in the profits and from the commissions he earned. We see Kourmoulis taking about 2000 guilders a year from the till of his firm for his private expenses, and this is far above the average income of a higher middle class person.

c. Problems of financing business

The weak side of the enormous expansion of Greek trade during the second half of the 18th century was that the big turnovers the Greeks made were not always financed by a large capital of their own. It is not unusual that merchants with a capital of 30,000 piasters would have merchandise worth 300,000 piasters in circulation¹⁹. Here lurked a big danger. The expansion of Greek trade was based on low profits which enabled the Greeks to undercut the prices of their competitors: they got enough income because of the large turnovers. But to keep up such a large trade a merchant with a small capital had to borrow enormous sums against rates of interest which were often very high. When there was a moment of slowing down in the circulation of merchandise, when there could be no quick sales, the burden of interest on the borrowed money could become so heavy that with the profits also the entire small capital of the merchant could disappear. When this happened bankruptcy was inevitable, usually with a debt of astronomic proportions. In many of the bankruptcies of Greek firms in the 18th century the overburden of interest on slow trade was a principal factor²⁰.

The Greek firms had several ways to obtain the money to finance their large turnovers which they could not cover with their own capital. The simplest, but the most expensive way was to borrow money on the free market in Turkey from «sarafides» or from merchants who had surplus money. The rate of interest in Turkey was very high, up to 12%²¹. A less expensive way was to borrow money not in Turkey but in Europe. Officially, most merchants in Turkey could not borrow directly in Europe; money-lending as it existed in Turkey was not a common practice in Europe. But there was a very common «unofficial» method. European merchants sent merchandise to Turkey but they did not expect immediate payment: the merchandise was ordinarily paid only after 3 or 6 months, often in natura, not in money. Especially if the Greek firm had a representative in Western Europe it was easy to finance business in the unofficial way. A very clear example is found in Korais' letter to Paterakis of 23 IX 1774. Korais' partner in Smyrna had received merchandise worth 50,000 piasters from Korais. He did not pay these, but left Korais in Amsterdam to keep the Amsterdam creditors quiet and invested the proceeds of the sale of the Amsterdam merchandise in operations in the Levant²². In this way the European partner would often get into serious difficulties. There was still another way of financing which was used in the 18th century: by way of circulating bills of change. This was a very dangerous game. We find several examples of it in Kourmoulis' correspondence²³. An example: Kalvokoressis in Constantinople had to pay some debt in Constantinople but he had no money. He paid his creditor with a bill of change he drew on Korais in Amsterdam. The creditor sent the bill to a relation in Amsterdam, who tried to get his money from Korais. But Korais paid him with a bill of change for the amount and the discount on Kourmoulis in Venice. The new bill was sent to some merchant in Venice, who got in his turn a bill of change for the amount and the discount on Kalvokoressis, who at last paid his debt: the amount and the accumulated discounts, after a period of several months. For this extension of time he had to pay the discounts, but these were often less than the ordinary rate of interest with the sarafides. It was a dangerous game because it could easily lead to overextension of credit and serious accidents. Conservative merchants refused to play in this game, honourable people like Koraïs also had qualms, but to the more adventurous people it was attractive because it offered the possibility of speculation with international courses of exchange. With some luck the discounts were reduced by profits through clever speculation. Many merchants fell victim to this game: there were several bankruptcies of it in 1773. Thus when one member of the circle got too many bills at once, he would be unable to pay; other merchants then would refuse his bills of change, and bankruptcy would be inevitable²⁴. The bankruptcy of Avgerinos in 1784 took this shape: Kourmoulis was unable to pay the enormous bills his partner sent him from Constantinople because his partner in Smyrna did not pay his debts to him²⁵. Accidents with bills of change were the principal cause of the Amsterdam economic crisis of 1773. It is not strange that at that moment Koraïs refused to participate in a game with bills of change proposed by the Constantinople merchant Loukas Kalvokoressis.

B. Koraïs as a merchant

There exist several untrue traditions on Koraïs' life as a merchant in Amsterdam. His own autobiography is one of the sources of the mystifications; other untrue stories were made up by his enemies. All judgments on Koraïs' achievements as a merchant date from a time much later than the events, with the exception of a series of letters written by Koraïs' own clerk Stamati Petro, a person who had an extreme dislike for his master. Our account of the events is chiefly based on statistical sources from the archives of the Dutch consulate of Smyrna and on the correspondence in the archive of Dimitrios Kourmoulis, a friend and colleague of Korais.

Korais tells in his autobiography that he was sent to Amsterdam as a representative of the business firm of his father, Joannis Korais, who was a silk merchant. According to Korais, his father wanted to extend his business to Holland, in imitation of his father-in-law, Rysios²⁶. This is only partially true. In the Dutch archives there are several documents on the trade of Joannis Korais and Adamantios Rysios²⁷. They show that both had conducted trade with Holland during the years 1740-1750, not in silk, but in felt, angora wool, crude and white or red spun cotton and drape: the ordinary trade with the Levant. Later this trade stopped and we find Joannis Korais together with his brother Pandelis importing drape from Leghorn²⁸.

It is shown by the letters of Stamati Petro that Korais did not go to Holland as a representative of his father, nor as a silk trader. Korais' business in Amsterdam was to be the head of an Amsterdam business house which would belong to a newly established Greek network of firms, directed by Stathi Thomas in Smyrna. This firm would do the ordinary Levant trade²⁹. Usually such networks were owned in parts by several merchants, and the heads of the working companies were shareholders. It is fairly certain that the Korais family had a share in the enterprise of Thomas, but Joannis Korais did not actively participate in the working of the enterprise. Korais' story about silk trade is improbable because Holland was not an important market for Levantine silk any more; silk sold in Holland mostly came from China. Why did Koraïs tell this story? Did he have a loss of memory or did he try to show his father as a merchant who sold aristocratic products? In fact Koraïs' father was an important personality in Smyrna; we should not believe Stamati's remarks that Koraïs' family was nothing special³⁰. Joannis Koraïs was a member of an important business house (Bakchatoris), he was sometimes dimogeron of the Greek community in Smyrna, and from a letter of the Dutch consul in Smyrna we get the impression that he was a highly respected person³¹.

During the years 1773-1774 Diamantis Koraïs was the representative in Amsterdam of the society presided by Stathi Thomas. Stathi was a rich Greek merchant who, from \pm 1760 till 1772, had been a member of the Amsterdam firm of Stathi Thomas & Stephanos Isaïou (d'Isay in Western sources). This was a very large and successful enterprise which acted in Amsterdam as agent for a number of Greek firms, among which Mavrokordatos and Anastas, the largest Greek firm of Smyrna. For unknown reasons the firm of Thomas & Isaïou split up in 1772. Stephanos Isaïou remained in Amsterdam as the sole owner of a rapidly expanding enterprise. His wealth became proverbial³². His firm is mentioned still many years afterwards as Koraïs' bank relation³³. Stathi Thomas was not as successful as his partner. After the separation he began a business house in Smyrna. It is a little strange that he did not have his former partner d'Isay as his agent in Amsterdam; instead his firm began an agency of its own directed by his new business partner Diamantis Korais. Maybe Stathi and Stephanos had had some quarrel; Stathi seems to have been a rather difficult character³⁴.

32. The importance of the firms of Stephanos and Mavrokordatos can be seen from A.R.A., Archives of the consulate in Smyrna, cc and dd. The possibility mentioned by Iliou, p. $\mu\alpha'$ that the πλούταξ Koraïs wrote about was Stephanos is a certainty: no other merchant contemporary of Koraïs was at that moment a rich man in Amsterdam.

Dutch statistics show that Stathi did not have much luck with his enterprises³⁵. After an energetic beginning trade slackened and almost came to a standstill. Mutual recriminations followed: Korais' Patmian clerk Stamati Petro, who had been sent with Korais to Amsterdam by Stathi as some kind of spy, sent highly coloured reports to Smyrna about the incredible stupidity of Korais³⁶. Korais wrote his views in an already published letter to the partners who were agents of the firm in Constantinople, Petrokokkinos and Paterakis³⁷. In this letter Korais offers a profound analysis of some important aspects of Levantine trade. This letter shows that Korais had employed his large intellectual capacities in his work and that he understood the system of Levantine trade excellently. His idea was to imitate some large Dutch firms and Isaïou and to take the production of woolen cloth for exportation to the Levant into the firm's own hands. We know Korais wanted also to take transportation into his own hands by chartering ships instead of being dependent on other transporters³⁸. Stathi did not want this. It is possible that the separation of Stathi and

38. The case of the chartering of a ship by Korais in Iliou, who seems to have formed a false impression on the basis of Stamati's remarks. Korais did charter a Dutch ship, which remained the property of its captain, Abraham Langendijk. Later there were ships owned by Greek merchants in Amsterdam, but this was not the case with the ship De Nieuwe Hoop, which was chartered by Korais. The contract in Municipal Archives Amsterdam, NAA 15689/520, see appendix 2 nr. 4. The cargo of this ship during the period Korais chartered it is enumerated in appendix 3 nr. 3.

Stephanos had something to do with divergence of opinion between the two partners about the modernization of business methods. Stathi was a profoundly conservative merchant.

From several sources we can see that Korais wanted to do business as a first class merchant, not as backstreet trader. He installed himself in a prosperous neighbourhood of Amsterdam, near the Exchange. His address was immediately printed in the address book of the Amsterdam merchants³⁹, and he seems to have distributed printed pricelists of the Amsterdam market in Greek⁴⁰. He was very active and went personally to the great auctions of the Dutch East India Company, while other merchants usually employed brokers⁴¹. He chartered a ship and wanted to enter into the manufacturing of woollen cloth. He was an advocate of modern ways of payment but was against tricks with bills of exchange as practised by the Avgerinos firm. In his letter to Paterakis and Petrokokkinos he showed a clear understanding. In short: he was not the boy of the Levantine ghetto Stamati Petro would like him to be.

Stathi did not like this way of doing business. He preferred speculative ventures in the interior trade of the Ottoman Empire above slow but sure investments. Stathi is an example of a speculating medieval merchant, while Korais is an adept of early modern capitalism. When Korais sent to Smyrna large quantities of European merchandise, Stathi did not reply by sending Levantine merchandise for an equal value, but he used the proceeds of the sale of the European products to speculate in the interior trade of the Ottoman Empire, leaving Korais to cope with the people he had borrowed money from to buy his exportation merchandise. In this way Stathi got an enormous debt with Korais.

40. Iliou, p.p. 73-77. Iliou's interpretation (p. 73) is not entirely correct, this piece of printing is not a «fattura» but a price-list of the Amsterdam Exchange which existed in Dutch already from the 16th century on; during the 18th century they are known in many languages.

41. Appendix 3 nr. 4.

The outcome was that Koraïs had no longer any money or credit to buy European merchandise and trade slackened⁴².

In these circumstances Koraïs began to tread very wearily and slow down business as much as possible. He had still another reason to do so: in 1773-1774 there was a serious financial crisis in Amsterdam. Two of the leading bankers went bankrupt and the crisis spread all over Europe. Even in Smyrna a large Greek firm, Ambrosios Mavrokordatos, went bankrupt. This happened in Koraïs' own close surroundings: he was a close friend of the son of the Amsterdam agent of Ambrosios Mavrokordatos, Riga Nioti. From Kourmoulis' correspondence we know that Koraïs, like Kourmoulis himself, had become afraid to take risks: the whole Kourmoulis correspondence of that time is full of warnings by the Levant partners to the European agents not to lose kouragio and to go on with business⁴³.

There may have been several reasons for the lack of success of Koraïs as a trader. His principal partner, Stathi Thomas, was not a very good trader, and his ideas were incompatible with those of Koraïs. There was also the crisis: a difficult moment to begin a business venture. Also there was a possible lack of commercial abilities in Koraïs himself. According to Stamati Petro, Koraïs' was the worst imaginable merchant, an incompetent money squandering Don Juan. Stamati's has been until now the only available opinion on Koraïs as a trader, and because of that, Koraïs has been accused of being the only cause of the lack of progress of the business. On the basis of the material we have found we can not say that Stamati's slander is very plausible to us. A merchant as stupid as the Koraïs described in Stamati's letters would have gone bankrupt within a few weeks. We have contrary information in the correspondence of Kourmoulis. Avgerinos and Kalvokoressis were very satisfied with Koraïs' actions as their

42. The difficulties in which Koraïs was at that moment are shown in a letter by Stamati who wrote that Koraïs had to pawn merchandise destined for exportation, Iliou, p. 49. See also above, note 22.

43. The crisis is mentioned by Stamati: 'Ηλιοῦ, 49. Many remarks on the crisis in A.R.A. Archives of the embassy in Turkey 1215-1216 (letters of Kalvokoressis and J. Avgerinos spring-early summer 1773). See also note 23.

agent, even at the moment that they had already become aware of a large conflict with Stathi: they hoped that Koraïs would continue acting for them and that he would not stop trading because of his quarrel with Stathi⁴⁴.

In August 1774, Stathi Thomas, probably influenced by Stamati's letters, was planning to end his partnership with Koraïs. This we know from rumours recorded in Kourmoulis' correspondence⁴⁵. His partners asked Kourmoulis to keep it secret from Koraïs, but by some means Koraïs got some information of it, and was also planning a separation himself⁴⁶. At the same time he seems to have started a simpler life and left his house on the Oudezijds Voorburgwal for a house near the harbour⁴⁷. Stamati went on to act as an agent for Stathi⁴⁸.

For some time we have no statistical account on Koraïs' trade: manifests of Dutch shipping for the first half of 1775 are lacking, but we see that in 1775 he entered into a new partnership, which shows that he had still some capital available. The new partnership was with Ambrosios Rallis in Smyrna and with Antonios Paterakis in Constantinople—it seems that the Constantinople partner of Stathi's firm had chosen the side of Koraïs. But Koraïs' new firm was only a relatively small affair which did not do much business. Koraïs seems to have had a bad experience in his relations with Stathi and not to have over-Stamati was not such an exemplary merchant as he sees himself, he is recorded among the bad debtors of the Dutch East India Company: A.R.A. V.O.C. b 998. In 1799 Stamati left Amsterdam and returned to Patmos. On his passage through Constantinople he arrived with letters of recommendation from Amsterdam at the Dutch embassy and received from the ambassador the office of Dutch consul in Patmos, but he was soon dismissed because of neglect of duty: A.R.A. come it⁴⁹. He showed little interest in trade, and he did not conduct much business: a little with Rallis and a little with Demetrios Bakchatoris, business partner of his father⁵⁰. Already in 1776 the new society was ended, because, according to the words of Joannis Avgerinos o Korais den porpati kala; this was the same Avgerinos whose firm had been so satisfied with Korais in 1773-1774 that they wanted to transfer their considerable trade from Stephanos d'Isay to Korais⁵¹.

This was the end of the business career of Korais. He still remained for two years in Amsterdam, but we find no mention of him in Dutch trade statistics. We will end this account of Korais' business ventures with the refutation of an old legend. In the literature we find the accusation that Korais would have gone bankrupt in Amsterdam and that he would have absconded without paying his debts. This story cannot be true. If a merchant in Amsterdam went bankrupt, his business was put into the hands of the Desolate Boedelkamer, a special court of law for bankruptcy. The archives of this court have been very well preserved, but there is no mention of a bankruptcy of Korais in them. It is also improbable that Korais would have incurred large debts. To avoid a bankruptcy, Korais might have made an agreement with his creditors to pay slowly, —and maybe absconded afterwards—. But there is no such agreement in the protocols of the Amsterdam notaries who acted for Korais. Indeed we see Korais in some financial problems in 1776, but in 1777 these seem to have passed⁵². If Korais had had serious debts we would expect to see in the notarial protocols and in the registers of the chancery deeds of Smyrna a lot of protests of bills of exchange and of powers of attorney to collect debts, but there is nothing except one protested bill of exchange for a relatively small amount which was paid afterwards. If Korais had left bad debts, he would have had them with Ambrosios Rallis, his former partner, or with Stephanos d'Isay, who had helped him sometimes in Amsterdam⁵³. But he had later relations with both... and this would be inconceivable if he had left debts. There was no reason for a bankruptcy: Koraïs had brought his trade slowly to a standstill, and so he could not have suffered heavy sudden losses. The end of Koraïs as a merchant resembles the end of the firm of Prigkos the same year in Amsterdam, slowing down, and then leaving; an ending not glorious, but honourable⁵⁴.

C. Some Remarks on the intellectual life in Amsterdam and on the possible contacts of Koraïs

In the 18th century the Netherlands were an aristocratic republic with a federal constitution. In this republic there was a monarchical element: the stadhouder, hereditary commander of the army and navy who had also a large indirect political influence. Discontent about corruption and the imperfect working of the constitutional system had brought into being a wide opposition movement. This movement had begun with supporting the monarchical element, but the stadhouder was unable to remedy the existing problems. Thereupon disillusioned members of the opposition aimed their criticism against the stadhouder and began advocating a democratic republic. Shortly after Koraïs left Amsterdam, during the years 1781-1787 there were revolutionary upheavals.

Intellectual life in Holland had easy access to international currents of thought and to the literature of the enlightenment.

Freedom of the press had made Holland into the printing-house of modern Europe. As far as we can see most innovations in European thought did not at first cause vehement emotions in Holland; things were rather phlegmatically accepted or rejected. But in a sudden way there arose in 1768 an emotional discussion in which progressive thinkers and conservatives became the two opposing groups. It was the translation into Dutch of Marmontel's novel Belisaire (which appeared in 1767) which caused an enormous upheaval of pamphlet literature on the crucial question of the moral equality of Christianity and non-Christian religions⁵⁵. The thesis of the moral value of «natural religion» had been immediately rejected by the Sorbonne, but in Holland a group of liberal theologians and scholars defended Marmontel's views. Their most important spokesman was Petrus Burmannus secundus professor of Classical literature at the Amsterdam Athenaeum⁵⁶. He was the leading personality in a circle of important intellectuals and politicians, who assembled in his country house of Santhorst. Among its members we should at least mention the name of the great classical scholar Valckenaer, who was so much admired by Korais. At Santhorst Rousseau was revered, there was a spirit of deism and antimonarchialism and republicanism inspired by classical antiquity, Grotius and the glorious period of the Dutch republic of the 17th century⁵⁶. Outside the immediate circle of Santhorst there was among the supporters of Marmontel's thesis the leading Amsterdam theologian and clergyman Adriaan Buurt, who moved in the high society of this town and who was advocating the interesting thesis that the base of theology and religion should be founded on the objective base of the natural laws of mathematics⁵⁸.

We can affirm that Korais must have had very early contacts with this intellectual circle, because his teacher Bernard Keun, «predikant» at the Dutch Reformed Church of Smyrna, was a friend of Adriaan Buurt and represented the same kind of adogmatic ethical religion. Keun became elected member of the Academy of Haarlem, one of the strongholds of advanced thought in Holland⁵⁹. Keun's principal, the Dutch consul count Daniel Jean de Hochepped, was personally known to Koraïs; he was also an advocate of modern ideas⁶⁰. Another acquaintance of Koraïs, the rich merchant David van Lennep, had his children educated by the Swiss Dentand, a friend of Koraïs and also an advocate of modern ideas, while in the house of Van Lennep lived his partner Willem Ensle, who had a library containing several modern works⁶¹.

When Koraïs went to Amsterdam, Keun brought him into contact with his old friend Buurt. We have already mentioned Buurt's views on the matter of Belisaire and his views on the logical base of theology. Buurt was an irenic theologian. He wrote a large handbook on theology which was considered by later theologians to be extremely weak on the doctrinal and exegetical sides and to be tediously ethical and moralistic: a typical work of the enlightenment⁶². Buurt had a large interest in mathematics and natural history. He collected naturalia (a real penguin seems to have been the showpiece of his collection) and also antique coins⁶³. At Buurt's house Koraïs studied mathematics and so must inevitably have come in touch with his teacher's views. Keun wrote later that Koraïs had studied in Amsterdam «theologie naturelle»⁶⁴, the classical term for such a-dogmatical deism with a strong moralistic tendency which was a horror to all orthodox traditional theologians. Buurt's wife, Josina Carolina van Lynden van de Park was the daughter of a noble family who had tasted the pleasure of modern thought. She wrote a booklet on logic, which served Koraïs as a handbook in this discipline. She seems to have been a lady of advanced views and even something of a feminist. Both were reasonably rich people⁶⁵. Koraïs seems to have reciprocated the benefits received by teaching Buurt to speak Greek, because a poem written at the death of Buurt in 1781 tells us that Buurt was able to speak «Greek with the Greek», which is a clear allusion to his relation with Koraïs, which seems to have been commonly known in Amsterdam⁶⁶.

We can hardly doubt that Buurt, who did so much like to show his little museum to important visitors, would not show that other curiosity: the learned Greek. This gives a clear meaning to Koraïs' remark to Lotos that «he had known wise people in Amsterdam»⁶⁷. We may certainly suppose that he was acquainted with such a prominent inhabitant of Amsterdam as the lord of Santhorst, Petrus Burmannus, a contact which is the more interesting because it is known that Koraïs was working on classical texts during his stay in Amsterdam⁶⁸. We might mention here also that Burmannus' favorite pupil and editor of his posthumous works, Van Santen, had later some correspondence with Koraïs⁶⁹.

Moreover the great activity of the Amsterdam editors of French books could not have been unremarked by Koraïs; indeed it was certainly noticed by Buurt, who had a rich library. Last but not least we should remark that Koraïs' landlord of 1772-1774, the French merchant Pierre Geraud, moved in scholarly circles. His daughter Maria was Koraïs' great love who died so young in 1773⁷⁰.

In such intellectual surroundings Koraïs must have been strongly influenced by advanced views on theology and society. He did not yet publish them, but he must certainly have had a good knowledge of them.

Final conclusions

There has been some ambiguity in the appreciation of the importance of Koraïs' Amsterdam period. On the one hand we

70. It was in fact this mention by Stamati (Iliou, p. 30) which enabled us to identify exactly both the house Koraïs lived in and the girlfriend. I asked my colleague Mrs. E. Lievense of the Amsterdam Municipal Archives to find me the name and address of a family who had two houses on the Fluwelen Burgwal (this I knew from the addressbook, see note 38), and who had a daughter who died in March 1773 at the age of 18 years. By going through all the registers of deaths and burials all girls dying in early 1773 were noted, and from the baptismal registers the dates of birth were verified. In the registers of the Walloon church (where also Koraïs liked to go: Iliou p. 19) D.T.B. 1132, f. 111, she found a girl who answered the specifications: Marie, daughter of Pierre Geraud, a merchant in coffee and tea from Perpignan. The registration of sales of houses afterwards showed that Geraud had two houses on the Fluwelen Burgwal (now called Oudezijds Voorburgwal), namely numbers 63 and 65. It was then discovered that in nr. 59 lived Adriaan Buurt. Geraud must have been living in number 63 which he bought first; nr. 65 with the inscription God is mijn burcht, 1686 (God is my fortress) is the house in which Koraïs lived. The neighbour on the other side, also referred to in Stamati's letters was J. H. Kerkring. The canal on which Koraïs lived is shown in a contemporary engraving which even shows a glimpse of Koraïs' house. It is a pity that, while almost all houses on this canal are still in their old shape, number 65 has a modern facade, in which however the old inscriptions have been preserved. The building is now the Chinese church. Geraud is referred to in the travel description of a German scholar whom he guided through Amsterdam: H. Sander, Beschreibung seiner Reisen durch Frankreich und die Niederlanden, Holland, Deutschland und Italien, Leipzig 1783, p. 138-139.

have assertions by Korais himself that his stay in Amsterdam had been one of the great blessings in his life, on the other hand we have the murmurations of Stamati on his lazy, stupid boss and some other negative reports from his adversaries. Until now the only support of a positive appreciation of the Amsterdam period has been Korais himself, and those observers and biographers who are friendly to Korais tend to believe him, whereas his adversaries put the accent on the negative side which has been depicted in such dark colours by Stamati.

The material we have assembled in Holland tends to confirm the general outline of Korais' own views, even if we have found that Korais was not always truthful. But certainly Korais was not such a stupid merchant as he has been described, he had some sound understanding and there are also some positive reports on his business activities. As a merchant he was not very courageous, and his lack of activity seems to have had some connection with a fear to take risks, not necessarily with laziness. On the other hand we found that neither Stathi Thomas, nor Stamati Petro were such excellent merchants as they have been assumed to be simply because of their criticism of Korais' supposed mistakes. We lack the material to pass any definitive judgment now, however, on the basis of the new material we can say that the case against Korais has not been sufficiently proven, and that matters certainly did not end in such a bad disaster as has been supposed. On the whole, the episode of Korais as a merchant in Amsterdam is not only of some importance as part of the life-story of such an important personality as Korais, but also as an enlightening case-story of a Greek merchant in the West.

Finally, we have made some remarks on a problem which will never be completely solved. The question is how far Dutch influences have been important in Korais' political and religious views. At least we have been able to say that in Amsterdam (and probably already in 1769 in Smyrna) Korais had been in touch with modern Western thought. People like Keun and Buurt, possibly even more prominent people of advanced views, have been in contact with Korais, and probably the value Korais attributes to the schooling in Buurt's house in his autobiography is completely justified.

APPENDIX 1

Correspondence of Greek and Dutch merchants in Constaninople, Smyrna, and Venice refering to Korais.

In the following pages I have collected the references to Korais and his commercial activities, which I found in the correspondence of D. Kourmoulis. I would like to note that all these documents are long business letters in which Korais occupies a relatively small part. Three letters, those of Uberfeld & Serruriens, I publish whole. In the edition I have retained the spelling of the originals.

Favoriti con grame v(ost)re 12 e 24 p(rossim)o p(assat)o in riscontro ommetendo le repliche in quello andiamo d'accordo, v'accusiamo la ricevuta dalla di carrico di 4 balle fil d'Angora e 2 balle filati bianchi speditici gli SS(igno)ri v(ost)ri di Smirne colla nave di Cap(itan) Cornelis Evers, che sé le ritroveremo dalla qualità eccellente, ce gli fatte, vè nè faremo vedere un conto di vendita aggradevole; nell'altra ritrovassimo lettera dalli preletti SS(igno)ri v(ost)ri, quali ci ordinaro no la sicurezza di f. 4000 sopra detti fili d'Angora e di f. 600 sopra le 2 balle filati, quali rimane effettuata all Premio del 2 per %. Nella medesima loro lettera ritrovassimo pur di carrico di Partite 764 Legno Bossolo, 10 balle cottoni sodi e 3 balle doppie filati caricati per loro conto nella nave di Cap. Jochem Andriesen che desideriamo gionga ben torto e che siano dalla qualità in richiesta per potervene anche di questi farvene vedere solecite ed avvantaggiose deffinitioni.

Compiegati ritrovarete coppie di 2 conti di vendita di due Partite cottoni per Cap(ita)n ambi di balle, 10 l'una venduta à d. $23\frac{1}{4}$ e l'altra à d. 24; la p(ri)ma montante f. 1253.8 e l'altra f. 1259.7. così quello dalle 3 balle filati bianchi per Cap(ita)n Claas Gerritsz riuscitaci di vendere à d. 182 montando f. 649.3., de quali ne farete il necessario rimarco; delli cottoni soffersero danno, quale però non sorpassando il 10 per % non toccò gli sicuratori, è quello che di più ci spiace si è il peso loro à qui malamente corrisposto, ch'il tutto non è mancamento n(ost)ro perchè vi dovrete ritrovar contenti dalle n(ost)re operationi, mentre abbiamo aggito come meglio non avressimo potuto per noi medesimi e come nissun altro non avrebbe saputo meglio fare nelle circostanze presenti del commercio per le Merci che la ricercané per così dir morta. Ora non ci rimane più ch'il Legno Bossolo del quale non ci vengano offerti ne meno gli f. 4 le 10 balle cottoni ritirate dalli SS(igno)ri Diam(anti) Coray e Compagnia e le 5 balle detti per Cap(itan) Pr Bakker, quali sendo d'una s'infima qualità, non possiamo dirvi come né riusciremo; sendo bene qui faccile à noi di vendere, come é faccile à voi di dircelo, ma di vendere con onore e senza perdita? non e si fattibile.

Gli preffatti SS(igno)ri v(ost)ri di Smirne ci scrivono lo stesso, che ci scrivete voi circa il volerci far tratta dell'intero montante dalle Merci, che ci spediranno sopra; di che vogliamo dirvi che vogliamo ben fare ogni n(ost)ro possibile per facilitare gl'affari de n(ost)ri amici, ma contuttociò non possiamo risolverci d'abbracciare una tale propositione, non solo perche é difficile à fissare un intero valore dalle Merci à Caggione dei canggiamenti dalle circostanze del Neg(ozio) e de prezzi m'altresi perché gli molti altri n(ost)ri affari richiedano alle volte il pronto n(ost)ro danaro potressimo in un tal caso ritrovarci in penna, ed imbarazzati con le forti accettazioni e le Merci dormendo in Magazino come accade sovente per più motivi. Se ci potessero assicurare che le lor Merci si vendessero prontamente e che non saressimo mai in più di vedere gli n(ost)ri Magazini ripieni senza potergli veder vuoti à contento; abbracciar simo immediatamente la loro propositione, ma come ciò gl'è interamente impossibile; la prudenza vuole di non potergli aggradire e comeche siamo assicurati ch'il n(ost)ro modo di pensare faranno conoscere le n(ost)re ragioni ben fondate, ci lusinghiamo che non gli farà perdere di coraggio di continovarci la loro amicizia e gl'ordini loro, tantopiù per l'onestà dei n(ost)ri pontuali maneggi véné meritaremo sempre più la continovatione, per il che ci raccomandiamo ancora à voi nel miglior modo prometendovi che rifferetriemo gl'interessi dei n(ost)ri amici per gli più grandi dei n(ost)ri doveri. APPENDIX 2

Notarial and Consular Deeds

Fourteen documents of this kind have been found in the archives of the Dutch consulate in Smyrna and in the notarial protocols of the city of Amsterdam. Most of them are of a very common type: protests on merchandise of insufficient quality, protests of bills of exchange, powers of attorney. All these documents, with the exception of nr. 2 expressly mention Diamantis Koraïs. We have joined nr. 2 because we found in the bill of lading of the ship which this document refers to that the parcel of cloth in question was sent by Koraïs.

We should not get from this collection of what mostly seem to be commercial mistakes the false impression that Koraïs was a bad businessman; these papers come from large bundles with many hundreds of such papers, also on highly successful merchants. Also there is no indication of a bankruptcy of Koraïs in the protestation of a large bill of exchange in 1776 (nr. 9). If there had been such a thing, Stefanos would never have endorsed another bill on Koraïs as he did later (nr. 12).

In the subsequent descriptions of the documents the notarial protocols of Amsterdam (in the Municipal Archives of Amsterdam) have been indicated as N.A.A.; the protocols of the consulate of Smyrna (A.R.A.) have been indicated as C.A.S.

Amsterdam, 14 IV 1773

N.A.A. 15689/413

Notary E. M. Dorper.

Diamant Coray & Co authorize Jan Jacob Stapel, solicitor at the court of law of Amsterdam, to represent him in all actions of law.

witnesses Jacobus Jacobsz and Isaac Potholt

Smyrna, 20 IV 1773

C.A.S. series d 33

Johann Frederik Mann, chancellor of the Dutch Nation in Smyrna. The chancellor declares to have seen a quarter piece of violet wool-len cloth, 38 ells long, coming from a parcel with the mark —————→ brought in by the Dutch ship San Isidoro, captain Elias Hendriks, to Stathi Thomas, and sold by Stathi Thomas to the Greek merchant Mikes Pitsipios. The piece is stained and insufficiently dyed because of defective manufacturing. Four arbiters have been elected: Stefano Albertini and Jacob de Vogel for the sellers and Mathaios Rodokanakis and Giovanni Leondi for the buyers. They have judged that the buyer shall be given 31/2 ells in compensation.

Witnesses: Salomon Rodrigues and Isaac Sereno.

Smyrna, 30 IV 1773

C.A.S. series d 33

Johann Frederik Mann, chancellor of the Dutch Nation in Smyrna. The chancellor declares that 3 pieces of leadcoloured woollen cloth, long 459, 460 and 468 ells, coming from a parcel marked —————→ sent by D. Coray & Co to Stathi Thomas, and sold by Stathi Thomas to the shopkeeper Georgios Apalira, have been returned by the buyer because the cloth was stained. The chancellor has seen the cloth in presence of the witnesses Hendrik Bartendorff and Salomon Rodrigues and he has considered it to be a fault of manufacturing. Seller and buyer have agreed on reduction a on the price for 8 ells on each piece.

Amsterdam, 24 V 1773

N.A.A. 15689/510

Notary E. M. Dorper.

D. Coray & Co. charter the ship of Captain Abraham Langendijk, named De Nieuwe Hoop, of 80 lasts, for the price of 7500 guilders plus 5% ordinary avary compensation, plus 10 gold ducats present for the captain. The ship will sail to Smyrna and Constantinople and remain for 15 days in Constantinople and for 35 days in Smyrna where it will take in a new cargo from the partners of Coray.

Smyrna, 25 VIII 1773

C.A.S. series d 33

Johann Frederik Mann, chancellor of the Dutch Nation in Smyrna. The chancellor has gone, on the request of Stathi Thomas & Co to the office of this firm. There he has been shown a chest, marked nr. 57, in which there were 46 pieces of seersucker, sent by D. Coray & Co on the ship De Nieuwe Hoop, captain Abraham Langendijk. According to the invoice the price was: 26 pieces à f 43 and 20 pieces à f 32, but all the pieces are of equal size. These have been compared with a piece of seersucker shown to the cancellor by Stathi Thomas, coming from a chest marked nr. 1, containing 46 pieces of seersucker, among which according to the invoice 9 pieces costed f 33 and 37 pieces f 40³/₄. These pieces had a size of approximately 20 ells, which shows that in the former chest 26 pieces would be 4 ells short.

Witnesses: Justin Philibert Marin and Hendrik Bartendorff.

Note: the parcel nr. 1 was sent by Koraïs to the Greek business firme of the Brothers Metaxa in Smyrna

6

Amsterdam, 30 VIII 1773

N.A.A. 15690/729

Notary E. M. Dorper.

On request of Diamanti Coray & Co the notary has asked Jacques Brentano Semenza, merchant in Amsterdam, why he did not pay a bill of change drawn on him by G. Rougier and Sons in Marseilles in favour of Coray for the amount of f 1800 Amsterdam bank money. Brentano has answered: «qu'il n'acceptoit point la dite lettre faute d'avis», on which the notary has protested according to custom.

Witnesses: Christiaan Holtschenkopff and Johannes Wilhelm van Braam.

Amsterdam, 11.XI 1774

N.A.A. 15695/701

Notary E. M. Dorper.

Stamati Petro witnesses on request of Diamant Coray & Co about the abuse the broker H. van Wayenburg made in december 1772 of the fact that Coray did not speak Dutch at the occasion of the sale of 900 pound ginger.

Signed by D. Coray, S. Petro and J. J. Storch, sworn translator, and by the witnesses J. Jacobsz and J. C. Wagner.

With annexed a copy of a declaration signed by D. J. van Hogendorp on behalf of the Burgermasters of Amsterdam that Stamati Petro has sworn his testimony.

Amsterdam, 4 V 1775

Notary E. M. Dorper

D. Coray & Co give power of attorney to Joannis Koraïs and Demetrios Bakchatoris in Smyrna in order to collect all money debtors in Smyrna owe Coray.

Witnesses: J. Jacobsz and J. C. Wagner.

9

Amsterdam, 3 IX 1776

N.A.A. 10884/508

Notary S. Dorper.

On request of Stephanus d'Isay & Co, merchants in Amsterdam, the notary has asked D. Coray why he did not pay a bill of exchange drawn on him by Michail Patrikios of Smyrna for the amount of f 4104/4. Coray has answered «Nous ecrivons au tireur la raison pour laquelle nous ne payons point sa lettre». The notary has protested according to custom, and subsequently Stephanus d'Isay have declared that they will pay the bill «pour compte et honneur du tireur».

Witnesses J. J. Clement and J. C. Wagner.

Annexed a letter of the notary to Coray of 3 IX 1776 on which Coray has written his answer, and a copy of the bill of exchange drawn by M. Patrikios on D. Coray in favour of Joannis Mavrokordatos & Joannis Anastasios of Smyrna, endorsed by the latter in favour of Pavlos Mavrokordatos & Co in Constantinople and endorsed by Pavlos Mavrokordatos in favour of Stephanus d'Isay & Co.

10

Amsterdam, 3 X 1776

N.A.A. 16885/586

Notary S. Dorper,

On request of Leonard de Vijver jr., merchant in Amsterdam, the notary has asked D. Coray why he did not pay a bill of exchange drawn of him by Antonios Morosinis and Leon Gialoussis of Smyrna for the amount of f 500 current money. Coray answered: «nous écrivons aux tireurs les raisons de non-payement», on which the notary has protested according to custom. Witnesses: J. C. Wagner and A. G. Hoefhamer.

The bill has been accepted under protest by S. D'Isay on 4 IX 1776.

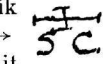

Wit annexed: letter of the notary to Coray on which Coray has written his answer, 4.IX 1776, and with copy of the bill of exchange, drawn 23 VII 1776 by Morosini & Gialoussis on Coray in favour of De Vijver.

Smyrna 9 X 1776

C.A.S. series d. 36

Abraham Keun, chancellor of the Dutch consulate in Smyrna.

On request of Ambrosio Ralli & Co, merchants in Smyrna, the chancellor has gone to the shop of Thodori Avgerinos in Smyrna. There he has seen 16³/₄ pieces of woollen cloth, being a parcel manufactured by Frederik Weerman Brijt, and sent by D. Coray under the mark  nr. 1 on the ship St. George, captain J. P. Hansen to Ralli, who has sold it to Avgerinos. The pieces are not of sufficient length, it is estimated that there are 4 ells short, for which compensation has been required.

Witnesses: Nicolo Sotira and Giuseppe Sorbi

12

Amsterdam, 7 X 1776

N.A.A. 10885/574

Notary S. Dorper.

A repetition of the protest nr. 9, with exactly the same text on a different date.

13

Smyrna, 4 X 1777 (copy)

C.A.S. series b vol. 7

Abraham Keun, chancellor of the Dutch consulate in Smyrna.

On the request of Joannis Mavrokordatos, Joannis Anastasios & Co the chancellor has asked D. Bakchatori to accept a bill of exchange drawn on Bakchatori by D. Coray in favour of G. & W. Reessen of Rotterdam for the amount of f 1821/11/8. Bakchatoris has replied: «non l'accetto perchè non ho ne denari, ne effetti ne avanzi del traente». On which the chancellor has protested according to custom. With Italian translation and copy of the bill of exchange, drawn 22.VIII 1777 by Coray on Bakchatoris in favour of Reessen and endorsed by Reessen in favour of Stephano d'Isay from Amsterdam and by d'Isay in favour of Mavrokordatos & Anastasios.

14

Smyrna, 7 XI 1777 (copy)

C.A.S. series b vol. 7

Abraham Keun, chancellor of the Dutch consulate in Smyrna.

On the request of Joannis Mavrokordatos, Joannis Anastasios & Co the chancellor has asked Joannis Korais for payment of the bill of exchange mentioned in nr. 12. Korais answered that he was not able to pay it immediately, but he was expecting money owing to him from the bezesten, and when he would receive this money, he would pay the bill of exchange immediately.

Witnesses: Giorgaki Amira and Giuseppe Sorbi
